ON THE ROAD: About 300 marchers, Negro and white, took part in the Mississippi March Sunday, June 19, and walked the 15 miles from Morgan City to Belzoni.

TAKING A BREAK: After eight miles of hiking in the hot sun, walkers take a break. Two thousand greeted marchers when they got to Belzoni that afternoon.

MEMPHIS, Tenn.—Earl H. Fisher, president of Local 19. 19, and members of his local have been on lots of lines, mostly picketing, but they'd never been on this kind of line before.

The line was the Mississippi March for Freedom, a line that covered 260 miles across rural Mississippi in three weeks to encourage Negroes to register.

Fisher and four other local members—Joe Barton, James Turner, Leroy Boyd and James Dinkins—drove from Memphis to Morgan City June 19, and walked the 15 miles from Morgan City to Belzoni.

Fisher said that many Negro tenant farmers along the march's route, although long kept in virtual serfdom by whites, came out to cheer the marchers and offer them ice water and some joined the march. When the 300 marchers got to Belzoni about four that afternoon, there were 2,000 people there to join them for a brief rally on the highway.

"It was quite an experience," Fisher said.

When the march arrived in Jackson the following Sunday, 12,000 people gathered for a rally in front of the state capitol.

The march was started by James H. Meredith, who desegregated the University of Mississippi in 1962. Meredith was shot from ambush on the second day of the march, but he recovered from his wounds and returned to lead the march into Jackson.

Organized Labor and Politics in Mississippi

When I accepted Doctor Baylen's invitation to address you a few months ago I assumed the subject matter would be rather easy to deal with. After accepting the invitation, however, I discovered that I had taken on quite an assignment. Our subject yesterday was relatively easy compared to our topic today.

Politics in Mississippi for the past one hundred years has been a rather complicated affair. When organized labor and the Negro are added, it becomes slightly more than complicated. Yesterday we briefly reviewed the history of organized labor in the United States so that you would more fully understand our problems in Mississippi. Today I propose to take the same approach. We will briefly touch the National scene and then, to the best of my ability, review the situation at the State level.

The American Labor Movement learned early that many of its objectives could not be attained at the bargaining table. Many of these objectives required Legislative action. From experience, organized labor had also learned that many of its hard won gains at the bargaining table could be taken away by one stroke of the legislative pen. This meant, as a matter of necessity, that Labor had to become active in politics.

For years the American Federation of Labor tried to stand aloof from the political arena. Samuel Gompers felt that an active lobby in Washington would suffice. This attitude almost proved fatal; lobbying had little effect on members of Congress who had been elected by enemies of the labor movement.

In 1890, Congress passed the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. This Act, supposedly, was designed to hold down and control monopolies in the business community. The Act had not been on the statute books long, however, when its full force was brought to bear against trade unions. For twenty long years the American Labor Movement was harassed and persecuted with this law. Millions of dollars were spent in the courts and many unions were destroyed during this period. Finally, in 1914, Congress passed the Clayton Act which clearly stated, and I quote, "The labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce." Even though the Clayton Act removed organized labor from the clutches of the Anti-Trust Act, progress was slow for the next twenty years.

During most of this period the Nation was on a superficial binge. It was to take a great depression and thousands of people out of work before the Nation was to come to its senses. As I advised you yesterday, I was thirteen years old when the depression came and have a vivid memory of those dark days during the history of this country.

When Franklin D. Roosevelt was elected President in 1932, a Congress committed to social reform was also elected. The Nation was on the verge of revolt and it was very apparent that something had to be done. During Roosevelt's first and second terms in office, Congress passed a steady stream of legislative acts designed to not only get America back on its feet but to also prevent any more disasters such as what occurred in 1929. Most of this legislation had long been advocated by the American Labor Movement. Briefly, I would like to review a few of those measures with you and attempt to show what they mean to the American people.

The economy of this state and of the Nation is dependent, to a large degree, upon the purchasing power of the work force. Many of the New Deal measures were designed to stabilize and shore up that purchasing power. The Wagner Act or National Labor Relations Act passed in 1935 gave labor a legal right to organize. This Act established a National policy of encouraging the collective bargaining process and set up certain safeguards for working people who wished to organize. As a result, we have over 17 million organized workers in the United States today who are covered by labor agreements. Wages and other conditions are nailed down by contract. This means that employers can not cut wages when a depression appears on the horizon.

The Fair Labor Standard Act or Minimum Wage puts a floor under wages for most workers who work in industries dealing in interstate commerce. This law has a stabilizing effect, for it also prevents wage reductions below the minimum in unorganized industries.

The Employment Security Act provides unemployment insurance for workers who are thrown out of work by no fault of their own. This Act provides them with some income whereby he can purchase the necessities of life.

The Social Security Act provides purchasing power for the retired workers and keeps them from becoming wards of society. Recent amendments also provide hospital and medical care.

Added together, all of these things have done much to stabilize the economy. In my opinion they prevented at least two depressions in the Fifties during the Eisenhower Administration. Obviously, many of the programs initiated by Presidents Kennedy and Johnson are designed to further improve the programs began by F.D.R.

Beginning in 1932, organized labor had a 15-year period of unparalleled success. More workers were organized than during any period, and many of Labor's legislative goals were attained. Tough days were ahead however, for an anti-labor Congress was elected in 1946. This Congress, in 1947, went to work immediately on the National Labor Relations Act. When the smoke cleared, labor had received a set back in the form of the Taft-Hartley Act. This Act removed many of the protective measures of the old Wagner Act and opened the door to Pandora's box by adding a new section, commonly known as 14-B. This section of the law is responsible for so-called "Right to Work" laws in 19 states. Mississippi,naturally, is one of those states.

Taft-Hartley was a signal to the labor movement that its efforts had to be redoubled in the political arena. Even so, things did not move in the right direction until after the merger of the AFL and CIO in 1955. In 1955, the AFL-CIO formed the Committee on Political Education. This, the political arm of the AFL-CIO, probably made the difference in President Kennedy's election in 1960 and certainly had much to do with the election of a friendly Congress that year. COPE had much to do with providing President Johnson with his landslide victory in 1964 and helped elect the most liberal Congress since 1932. COPE is presently working overtime to keep that majority intact in this off year election.

In view of the tremendous victory in 1964, organized labor had every reason to believe that Section 14-B of the Taft-Hartley Act would be repealed. As everyone knows, the House passed the repealer last year but a filibuster prevented it from being voted on in the Senate. Senator Eastland of this state certainly didn't endear himself with the members of my organization when he helped conduct that filibuster.

Having briefly touched the National picture, I will now attempt to review the Mississippi political situation from Labor's point of view.

Mississippi has the lowest per capita income of any state in the Nation. No state gains more by an increase in the minimum wage than does our state, yet our Congressional delegation consistently votes against minimum wage increases.

Our school teachers are the lowest paid of any state. We spend a larger percentage of our tax dollar for education than do many states,yet we spend less on each pupil than any state. No state benefits more from Federal Aid to Education than does Mississippi, yet our two Senators and our five Congressmen consistently vote against Federal Aid to Education.

We have a larger percentage of people on the Social Security rolls than many states. Yet, our Congressional delegation consistently votes against improvements to this Ac .

We have over fifty five thousand AFL-CIO members residing in Mississippi. When the House of Representatives voted to repeal Section 14-B of the Taft-Hartley Act, all five voted against repeal and, as I have already stated, Senator Eastland helped carry on a filibuster that prevented the Senate from voting.

You may well ask yourself as I have, who do these people represent in the Congress of the United States? It certainly isn't the poor workers,the school teachers, the retired people or the union people. When you total up the groups just mentioned, you come up with a vast majority of the people who live and work in this state. How and why is this possible? I hope to answer that question later on in my remarks.

In 1959, the organization I represent warned the people of Mississippi what would happen if Ross Barnett was elected Governor. The record speaks for itself. Barnett's Administration will go down in history as one of the worst ever. Our predictions were far short of what actually happened.

When the legislature convened in Jackson in January of 1960, we had one of the best Workmen's Compensation laws of any state. When it left town six months later, we had one of the worst. When Barnett was elected Governor we had a fairly progressive tax system. He and the legislature changed it to one of the worst. A windfall of 18 or 20 million dollars per biennium was handed to corporations and the wealthy in the form of tax reductions. In 1960, the state had 35 million dollars in surplus funds. Two years later the state was broke. In 1962, this same Governor and this same legislature raised the sales tax to balance the budget. In a period of two years, the cost of state government was shifted from the backs of those best able to pay to the backs of those least able to pay.

When Barnett was elected Governor we had a so-called "Right to Work" law on the statute books. As payment to some of his financial supporters, he initiated a move to make this law a part of the Constitution. The object, of course, was to make it more difficult to repeal. As long as this law was a simple legislative act, any session of the legislature could repeal it by a majority vote of both Houses. Barnett and his cohorts knew that this would be done as soon as the people realized what "Right to Work" was all about.

In 1962, at the end of the second regular session of the legislature, Barnett's stock was at an all time low. Any one associated with his Administration was thought to be dead politically for all time to come. This was not to be, however, for a young Negro by the name of James Meridith gave Barnett an out. When the Courts ordered Meridith's admission to this University, Barnett and the people around him saw this as an opportunity to create a diversion and in so doing to get the people's minds on something other than his putrid Administration.

Use it he did. He came close to ruining this University and almost wrecked the state, but he got the people's minds on something other than the Capitol in Jackson. In spite of Senator Robert Kennedy's recent exposure of Barnett's double-dealing in this situation, we must worry today over the prospect of this man being Governor again.

After reviewing the deplorable voting record of the Mississippi Congressional delegation, the Barnett Administration and the Mississippi Legislature, the Mississippi AFL-CIO decided in the fall of 1960 that the time was overdue for Labor to initiate a concerted political action program in our state. Consequently, in a special convention, the organization adopted a "Program of Progress." This program spelled out our legislative goals and levied an assessment of $1.50 per member per year with which to finance the program. In reality, the program is simple. It concentrates on voter registration, voter education and communication with the rank and file. The assessment provided the necessary funds to purchase an addressograph system and other needed equipment. This equipment was purchased in 1961. By the fall of 1963, we had approximately twenty five thousand names and addresses on addressograph plates. In the meantime the legislature was reapportioned, giving the industrial counties more representation in that body.

When our "Program of Progress" was adopted in 1961, the Hederman press in Jackson branded it as an attempt by organized labor to take over our state government. I want to read you the eighteen legislative goals of that program, and let you decide whether or not we have the interest of our state at heart. The eighteen points are as follows:

1. Establish a State Department of Labor
2. Reapportion State Legislature
3. Increase Workmen's Compensation
4. Provide State Quaranteed Loans for College Education to Qualified High School Graduates
5. Increase Unemployment Insurance
6. Revise Mississippi Tax Laws
7. Enact State Davis-Bacon Prevailing Wage Law
8. Change Primary Elections from Tuesdays to Saturdays
9. Enact Temporary Disability Insurance Law
10. Raise Salaries of Mississippi School Teachers up to Average for Southern States
11. Enact Comprehensive Child Labor Laws
12. Enact State Civil Service Law to Cover all State Employees
13. Qualify Women as Jurors on Equal Basis with Men
14. Increase Maximum Amounts of Assistance to the Aged and to the Permanently and Totally Disabled
15. Amend State Constitution to Provide Initiative Referendum Procedures
16. Enact State Fair Labor Standards Act
17. Amend State Constitution to Eliminate Poll Tax Payments as Requirement to Qualify to Vote
18. Enact Law Requiring Equal Pay to Women for Work Equal to that Done by Men

As you will note, not one point of this program is designed to help union members only. Our program is designed to uplift the state as a whole - our enemies to the contrary.

Our political action program is built around fourteen Central Labor Councils throughout the state. These organizations represent AFL-CIO local unions at the county and city level. Most of them have several counties under their jurisdiction. Representatives of these organizations interview candidates who are running for city or county offices. They check voting records of members of the legislature and make recommendations to the membership based upon their findings. Using our mailing equipment, we at the state office make this information available to the individual member. This is the thing that disturbs the Hederman press; they are afraid of an informed electorate.

This system and our equipment was used in the elections of 1963. Our efforts, along with reapportionment, has brought a small degree of change to the legislature. This is especially true in the Senate. Even so, there is still much room for improvement.

We mark progress in this state by the lack of damage done, not by progressive legislation adopted. This is due primarily to the fact that the legislature, as presently constituted, is not a truly representative body. It is due in part to the archaic rules that govern the assembly. It is due in part to the method of selecting the Speaker of the House of Representatives and is especially true in the method of selecting committees and committee chairmen. Contrary to the belief of many, the Governor is not the most powerful man in Mississippi. The most powerful man in this state is the Speaker of the House of Representatives. He appoints all committees and committee chairmen in the House and by virtue of this fact has a stranglehold on legislation considered by that body. Yet, this man answers to only a few thousand people in his district. The school teachers of this state found out how powerful this man was during the recent session of the legislature when he blocked for months their efforts to secure a pay increase.

The Senate, on the other hand, is much more responsive to the wishes of the people. In my opinion, this can be attributed to two factors. This body is more properly apportioned than the House and the presiding officer, the Lieutenant Governor, is elected state-at-large. The Senate provides us with hope for the future. It seems reasonable to assume that considerable progress will be made when both Houses are properly apportioned.

In a negative sort of way, the Negro has dominated Mississippi politics for many years. Instead of running for or against issues affecting the economic welfare of the people, most candidates have been elected on their ability to use the race issue. The reason for this of course centers around the fact that very few Negroes were allowed to use the ballot. For years we had the most stringent voter qualification laws of any state in the Nation. These laws, supposedly, were designed to keep the Negro from voting. In actuality, they kept the number of qualified voters down to a bare minimum.

A few years ago I read a report issued by the American Heritage Foundation which disclosed that Mississippi had the lowest percentage of people of voting age who were qualified to vote of any state in the Nation. These figures disclosed that only twenty five percent were qualified. At that time, only five percent of the Negroes were qualified. This means that at that time only twenty percent of the whites of voting age were qualified. To me this explains the election of people like Ross Barnett. It also explains the deplorable voting record of our Congressional delegation. Why should they worry about such things as minimum wage, education, social security and organized labor when a great majority of these people affected were not qualified to vote.

Without question, the system of government in these United States is the best yet devised by man. While our two major political parties leave much to be desired, their very existence has brought stability to our government down through the years. In reviewing the political history of our state, it is necessary in my opinion to acknowledge that many of our present day problems stem from the absence of a two-party system. This began in 1890 when James K.Vardaman first established the "Closed Society." Vardaman's ideas were actually a closed political system that excluded Negroes from the polling place and at the same time eliminated the Republican Party from the state. For over seventy years Vardaman's ideas prevailed. They prevailed, in large part, because the Republican Party was Lincoln's Party and any one who even thought about voting Republican was branded as a traitor to the state and to the South.

During Franklin D. Roosevelt's second term, cracks began to appear in the one-party Democratic South. When Roosevelt was first elected in 1932, he received a vast majority of the Southern vote, including those in Mississippi. The same thing occurred four years later but at the end of his second term, voices of dissent were beginning to be heard. The reason for this dissent was simple, Roosevelt was showing concern for the plight of the American Negro. Harry Truman continued Roosevelt's policies when he took over after FDR's death in 1945 and, as a result, Mississippi and several other states bolted the Democratic Party in 1948. As we all know the third party movement of that year was designed to prevent Truman's election. The people behind this movement felt Truman had to have the South to win. He proved them wrong and things have never been the same since.

The abortion of 1948 brought forth a strange political creature. He has been called a Dixiecrat by many but I prefer to call him a Republicrat. He is elected as a Democrat, accumulates seniority and receives committee assignments as a Democrat yet he is seldom loyal to the National Democratic Party. He consistently votes with the Republicans in Congress and several have even supported the nominees of the Republican Party in Presidential elections.

In 1960, several of our Republicrats supported Barnett's unpledged electors' scheme and helped throw our electoral vote down the drain. In so doing, they helped to create a Frankenstein which has already eliminated one of their members and will probably retire several more in the near future.

IN 1964, a man riding a white horse from out of the west, by the name of Barry Goldwater, carried the state by a lopsided majority. Goldwater, the Republican nominee, was to be the beneficiary of the political climate that began in 1948. Lyndon Johnson, the first man from the South to occupy the White House in a hundred years, received only 13 percent of the total vote cast in Mississippi. I can assure you, being a part of that 13% was quite an experience.

Lyndon Johnson's poor showing can be attributed in a large part to the fact that our entire Congressional delegation sat on their hands. They found themselves in a trap of their own making and were afraid to identify themselves with the National Democratic Party.

I consider myself a Democrat of the Roosevelt persuasion, yet I contend that a bonafide Republican Party is badly needed in our state. As a matter of fact, I will go one step further and say that the aims and objectives of the National Democratic Party can best be served in Mississippi with the establishment of a Republican Party. To carry this theory a little further, I suggest that most of the Democratic Party office holders in Mississippi should belong to the Republican Party. The voting record of our Congressional delegation certainly indicates that these people are affiliated with the wrong party. What may I ask, outside of party label, is the difference between Jim Eastland and Prentiss Walker? Eastland has been in office longer than Walker, has voted with the Republican Party consistently, yet Walker is out to replace him in the Senate. Eastland is a good example of one of the glaring weaknesses of our system, the lack of party responsibility. If people like Eastland can't support the platform and nominess of the National party, they have no right to positions of power within that party.

The gubernatorial election in 1964 marked the end to a one party system in the state of Mississippi. Rubel Phillips may never be Governor of this state but I predict he will hav a place in Mississippi history. When Phillips received almost forty percent of the vote in that election, he assured a two party system in our state from that point on. The Goldwater vote in the Presidential election a year later further established this fact. After generations of voting the straight Democratic ticket, no matter who the candidate, the people of this state finally decided they could vote Republican without becoming contaminated. My major concern at this time centers around the fact that we are now in danger of becoming a one party Republican state. As I view the situation, Organized Labor and the newly enfranchised Negroes are the only forces around to prevent it from happening.

Since the debacle of 1964, I, along with a number of other people, have spent considerable time in attempting to rebuild the Democratic Party in the state. As of this date, little fruit has resulted from these efforts. Our major accomplishment up to this point has been with the Young Democrat Clubs of America. The National organization finally granted a charter to a bi-racial group that is pledged to the National Party.

It appears that the Mississippi Democratic Party is going to have to suffer several more defeats before it is willing to reorganize along the same lines. As I have pointed out to the National Democratic Committee, the Republican Party in Mississippi is well organized and well financed. This means the Republicans are going to have much more political success in the near future than the Democrats, unless the Democrats also organize.

In final analysis it can be said that Organized Labor, the Republican Party and the Negro will play important roles in Mississippi politics in the near future, or so I predict. Several factors prompt me to make this statement. Our state has already modified its registration laws and the poll tax is out of the picture. These things were done, of course, as a result of pressure from Washington. The fact remains, we now have liberal registration laws.

Instead of twenty five percent, we should have seventy five percent of the people of voting age registered in the near future. This means that the politicians of this state will have to be more responsive to the needs of the people or face defeat.

As already stated, the Negro has played a negative role in Mississippi politics for many years. Instead of a negative role, he will be playing a positive one in the near future. We in the AFL-CIO intend to see that he does play a positive role.

Twenty six counties in Mississippi have a Negro population majority. Many of Labor's worst enemies in the Mississippi Legislature live in these counties. We have very few members residing in these counties; if these people are removed from office, it will have to be done with the Negro vote. To a large degree our legislative program is dependent upon our ability to form political alliance with these people. This we are trying to do. The enemies of the labor movement in this state know this and are working overtime to keep it from coming about. These enemies can be found in both the white and Negro communities.

For years we have been doing battle with the "Radical Right" in this state. Today we are faced with a similar problem from the "Radical Left" that has attached itself to the Negro community. We intend to meet this challenge also. As I stated yesterday, the AFL-CIO has always resisted any group or element that would subvert our system of government. We intend to continue that policy in Mississippi.

Ninety nine percent of the Negroes in this state are working people. They have a direct interest in such things as minimum wage, aid to education, social security and other phases of our legislative program. Working with such groups as the Voter Registration and Education League and the League of Women Voters, we intend to do our best to politically educate these new voters. We certainly intend to provide them with the record of those office holders who have consistently voted against the welfare of the people of this state.

As I stated yesterday, we are making considerable progress in the field of organization. Within the next few years we expect to add several more thousand members to our ranks. Using our mailing system, we hope to be able to politically educate these new members as well as the ones already organized. If our educational efforts are successful and if we are able to form political alliance with the Negro and other liberal forces in the state, we will have a new day in Mississippi.

Certainly, we have some tough days ahead of us. It will take a lot of doing to bring a semblance of political stability to Mississippi, but I am convinced that it can and will be done. Within the next few years the "race issue" should recede into the background. When this happens the Unpledged Democrats and the Freedom Democrats will be forced to join one of the major political parties. With a two-party system in operation, people will then begin to vote for candidates who identify with their own economic interest.

All of you have a stake in the final outcome. I welcome you to join with us in making this state a better place in which to live.

Virginia Primary Seen Victory For New South

By Saul Miller

The emergence of a New South, geared to sharp moderation of die-hard southern conservatism, took a giant step forward with the apparent defeat of two of the Old South's major leaders and a very slim victory for a third.

The Virginia Democratic primary elections virtually spelled the end of the organization of former Sen. Harry F. Byrd which had dominated Democratic Party politics in the state for nearly 40 years.

Major victim of the assault on the old-line Dixiecrats was Rep. Howard W. Smith, an 18-term member of the House who as chairman of the House Rules Committee has until fairly recently held life-or-death decisions over legislation.

An extreme conservative on economic, social and race matters, Smith, 83, lost unofficially by 364 votes to George C. Rawlings, Jr., a 44-year-old member of the Virginia House of Delegates from Fredericksburg.

Rawlings' stunning upset of the entrenched Smith, who had not lost an election in 60 years, was paralleled by the unofficial defeat of Sen. A. Willis Robertson, 79, chairman of the Senate Banking Committee, by State Sen. William B. Spong, Jr., of Portsmouth by some-

"Until we have a coalition of forces: Catholic, Protestant, Jewish, Negro, trade union, intellectuals, students and the enlightened business community, as a political movement there is not a single thing that we will eke out of this society, because we must now go to Congress to get billions of dollars to make whatever is possible, possible.

"The new program which will make it possible for the poor to become a part of the American society now comes into history in the year 1966 and meets exactly with labor's basic objectives.

"That program obviously includes the minimum wage. A $2 minimum wage tomorrow would do a hundred times as much overnight to bring millions and billions of dollars into the coffers of the poor as the present war on poverty will do in a hundred years.

"And we must fight to the death the notion that as long as there are 4 percent unemployed, that somehow or other this is good. Who are these 4 percent? They are not men; a man is a worker. If you say, 'Who is this man in RWDSU,' you will say he is a salesman or a clerk. But if I ask you who Mrs. Jones is who is on relief, the answer is, 'She is nobody,' for she is not a worker. And it is work and the dignity of work that we must stand for."

between Thai Buddhist and Thai Muslim that permeates the simplest relationships. The Buddhists regard the Muslims much as white farmers in Mississippi regard Negro sharecroppers. And since in the south the government official is almost always a Buddhist and the peasant a Muslim, the antipathy grows and communication lapses.

Officially, Bangkok attempts to reduce friction between its Buddhist and Muslim citizens. Recently a group of Muslim students who journeyed north to attend a handicraft exhibition in the capital were invited for an audience with the King, who is a demigod in Thailand's Buddhist theology. The Police Ministry has announced the opening of a course in Malay for policemen assigned to the south. But the government's attempts at conciliation are sometimes inept. The state-built blue-and-pink mosque in Pattani is crowded with the faithful on Fridays, but a short distance away in Narathiwat a high school stands vacant because the government did not install the separate kitchens required by Muslim dietary laws.

Last year the south was infested with Indonesian guerrillas en route to Malaysia. Dropped from unmarked planes or landed in small boats on Thailand's underpopulated western coast, which faces the island of Sumatra across the Strait of Malacca, the Indonesians were helped south into Malaysia by C.T.s who took their pay in arms and ammunition. Now that the Malaysian and Indonesian Foreign Ministers who met in Bangkok in May have buried the kris, this added irritant to the southern situation has been eliminated. But the threat of a Communist insurgency there remains serious, particularly if links have been established with the Thai Liberation Front in the northeast. Since even a small-scale guerrilla action could absorb almost all of Thailand's defense energies, the prospect of two co-ordinated campaigns is finally making American observers here take notice of the south. As one of the embassy political experts said, "If the Communists ever move into a full-fledged insurgency in both the south and the northeast at the same time, Thailand will have more than it can handle alone."

The Negro Stake In Washington Home Rule

MARTIN F. NOLAN

"I AM in love with Washington," Mrs. Johnson told readers of the Washington Post recently. "It is a vivid, stimulating city, full of pageant and great deeds. . . ." One stimulus that the city does not offer, however, is enjoyed by nearly every other United States territory, possession, and political entity: rudimentary self-government. The restoration of "home rule," taken away from Washington in 1874, has been a continuing interest of Mrs. Johnson's husband, who spoke thus of the city last August 26, ten days after the rioting in the Watts section of Los Angeles had ended:

"Those of you here in the District of Columbia, I want to warn you this morning that the clock is ticking, time is moving, that we should and we must ask ourselves every night when we go home; are we doing all that we should do in our Nation's capital . . . ?" What gave the President's remarks particular urgency was the fact that home rule for the District has now become pre-eminently a civil-rights issue, with significance for the nation at large. At that moment, the President was doing all he could for a discharge petition to dislodge a home-rule bill from the House District Committee. The petition achieved success on September 3, with nine Texans among the last thirty-five Congressmen to sign, even though six of the nine later voted against bringing up the bill for debate. Earlier, the Senate had passed a home-rule bill for the sixth time. The bill called for an elected mayor, city council, and board of education and an automatic Federal payment to the District. (In fiscal 1966 the government paid 13.7 per cent of the District's general fund and operated certain highways and parks.)

Washingtonians had elected their own officials under several charters from 1802 until 1874, when Congress, outraged by the $20-million cost of public-works improvements in the city's expansion, took away self-government and established a system whereby the President appointed a three-man commission to govern the city. The commission governs the city today, along with a dozen other semi-Federal agencies, commissions, and advisory boards, all of whom owe direct allegiance to various bureaucratic satrapies. By statute, one of the commissioners is from the Army Corps of Engineers, usually a brigadier general, who oversees highways and other public works.

IN ITS ninety-two years without self-government, Washington has seen spurts of interest in home rule, usually coinciding with other causes such as women's suffrage and civil rights. The latest surge began in the late 1940's, when a few government lawyers helped form the Washington Home Rule Committee, now headed by Richard K. Lyon, a Washington-born lawyer. Traditional "white liberal" organizations like the city's labor groups, led by J. C. Turner, and the Democratic Central Committee, whose chairman is Joseph L. Rauh, Jr., have provided much of the muscle and manpower for this lobbying effort. Last fall, with the open aid of the White House and the firm prospect of a House vote, the cause of home rule never seemed brighter and its advocates never happier.

But after three days of lively debate, the House on September 29 killed the administration plan by substituting a proposal for a charter board. The charter plan's author, Representative B. F. Sisk, a California Democrat, told House members that this method was the same used "when your city or home town seeks either an original charter or a new charter."

A wide selection of charters had been offered to the House District Committee over the years, but without reaching the House floor. The protagonist in moving the Sisk substitute and killing the administration bill was Howard W. Smith of Virginia, chairman of the Rules Committee and one of ten Southerners on the District Committee. Smith, who was defeated in this year's Virginia primary, made a one-man stand against home rule, an effort his admirers considered his finest hour. In his beguiling wing-collar style of oratory, "Judge" Smith warned of the "fact that they are going to tax the Capitol. They are going to tax the White House. They are going to tax the chairs you gentlemen sit in today. . . . How much are those big leather chairs going to be appraised for when the Washington city-government agents come up here? What about that sumptuous furniture they have over in the Rayburn Building and all that kitchen equipment and various and sundry doodads and so forth?"

After Smith sat down to lusty applause, Carlton R. Sickles, a second-term Democrat from Maryland, spoke, saying of himself: "I think maybe they sent a boy to do a man's job because, like many in the House, I was impressed by the remarks of the previous speaker in the well." Sickles understated the case. Just as in the heyday of his conservative coalition, Smith rounded up Republican, Southern, and lukewarm Northern votes behind the Sisk substitute, which prevailed against administration efforts, 227-174. After a motion to recommit failed, Sisk's bill was passed, although Smith and sixty-six other sons of the Confederacy voted against final passage.

The Unmentioned Issue

So home rule failed, one of the few casualties among the President's Great Society programs. The reasons for its demise range from a weariness with White House pressures to a Congressional fondness for its prerogatives, which allow the city to maintain low prices on liquor, cigarettes, and taxi rides. The most fundamental reason for failure was the nationwide apathy enveloping home rule, alone among major domestic issues of 1965. Although a Harris Poll showed a 6-1 majority of Americans favoring self-government for Washington, the poll did not detect any passionate devotion to the cause.

Perhaps most people find it difficult to comprehend that in an age of broadened civil rights, some 200,000 Americans may vote only in Presidential elections. "No major capital in the world is in a comparable condition of disenfranchisement," President Johnson said in his home-rule message. But most Americans thinking of their capital see its cherry-blossom splendor and monumental grandeur; they seldom include the rest of the city's seventy square miles where people live.

Of Washington's 802,000 inhabitants, 62.5 per cent are Negroes. The public-school population is ninety per cent Negro. In the last fourteen years, more than 215,000 white residents have left Washington, 86,400 of them during the three years following the desegregation of public schools in 1954.

That Washington would be the first large American city led by a Negro mayor and largely dominated by elected Negroes was and is a fundamental reality in the minds of Congressmen from North and South. Racial prejudice has undoubtedly been a factor in the thinking of the House District Committee, although its public attitude has been expressed in this typical colloquy between two of its members:

John L. McMillan (D., South Carolina), committee chairman: "I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Joel T. Broyhill, Republican], since he has been a very good member of the Committee on the District of Columbia for the past eight years, whether at any of the committee meetings he has heard civil-rights or race questions discussed by that committee?"

Broyhill replied: "The question of race and civil rights has never been discussed at any deliberation or meeting of the Committee on the District of Columbia. There are enough other problems involved which confront the District of Columbia without getting into the question of race and civil rights."

INDEED, many a House member would probably oppose home rule if the capital were peopled exclusively by Kiwanians. Many Congressmen were responding to a familiar anti-urban strain in American life. With anti-Negro emotion added, this sentiment can be powerful, however clumsily racial prejudice is concealed. One opposition witness, John R. Immer, president of the District's Federation of Citizens Associations, told the House committee, "We have one of the cleanest and most honest governments of any major city in the United States" (true, if he chooses to ignore widespread ticket fixing, Bobby Baker, and other peccadilloes involving Washington's 535-man city council, the Congress). Immer maintained that the administration bill "would replace this by a local political machine, managed by a clique which would be self-perpetuating. . . . there would be no control and no limit to the spending for welfare programs, free health programs, free food programs . . . and other programs designed to attract people here by lurid tales of the welfare largess which is awaiting them. . . . The District of Columbia is not ready for home rule. We do not have responsible political elements ready to take hold."

Immer spoke on behalf of some twenty thousand Washingtonians, one thousand of them Negro. Constituent organizations from his group also testified against home rule, using similar anti-political arguments. The neighborhoods represented include the District's most predominantly white areas: American University Park, Cathedral Heights, Chevy Chase, Cleveland Park, and Kalorama.

The major organized opposition to home rule came from the Metropolitan Washington Board of Trade, a group of bankers and businessmen. According to its promotional literature, the board was organized in 1889 "in the hope that . . . through concerted action by a representative body, we might exert a wide influence with Congress, and thus accomplish greater and more satisfactory results." This the board has done, notably in regard to home rule, which it has opposed for half a century. Its wide influence, according to Richard Lyon of the Washington Home Rule Committee, grows each year that Congress continues the city's votelessness: "The absence of self-government has created a political vacuum now happily occupied by the Board of Trade."

'Free D.C.'

While Lyon, Rauh, and the older "white liberal" elements of the home-rule cause have merely denounced the Board of Trade, a new group, the Free D. C. Movement, has set out to cripple it. Led by Marion Barry, Jr., Washington director of SNCC, in alliance with clergymen from the D. C. Coalition of Conscience, the movement has converted home rule into a civil-rights issue, singled out the Board of Trade as "the biggest obstacle," and employed the earliest weapon of the civil-rights struggle, the economic boycott.

After a partial but successful boycott of the city's bus system in January to protest a fare increase, Barry moved against "the money-lord merchants," asking some merchants to contribute money to the home-rule drive or face boycott. Cries of blackmail came from the merchants and even from many home-rule supporters. Barry backed off from the money solicitations and asked, "Why is it that people expect us in civil rights to do everything right all the time?" Dropping its requests for funds, the movement shifted to Negro areas, demanding the placing of "Free D.C." stickers in store windows as an alternative to picketing and boycott. This approach met with some success, especially among Negro merchants.

Barry, a thirty-year-old former chemistry teacher from Itta Bena, Mississippi, has described past efforts for home rule as "frustration and a long history of nothing." His aim is "to educate, mobilize, galvanize, and catalyze this community around the right to vote." In trying to transform the history and reputation of docility among the city's 502,000 Negroes, Barry has eclipsed the efforts of the "white liberal" leadership of home rule and has also begun to fill a vacuum of political leadership among Negroes. Organizations like the Urban League and the NAACP have worked toward wider opportunities in jobs, housing, schools, and police relations rather than stressing political activity.

Barry's main support has come from leading clergymen, who share his sentiment on mobilizing the city's poor Negroes. After the boycott campaign began with fund solicitations in February, Rauh called one of the clergymen, asking him to intervene before the boycott's effects damaged home rule in Congress. "Joe, even if home rule is set back a few years," the clergyman replied, "it will be worth the price if we can wake up the poor Negroes of this city." It is taken for granted by home-rule leaders of all persuasions that the longer self-government is denied, the greater the chances are for militant, strident forces in the city's first election. The 1964 Democratic primary and Presidential elections were dominated by the city's large and long-established Negro middle class. But this group's influence and numbers will probably decline without self-government, and SNCC and other militant elements will fill the leadership vacuum among Negroes.

THE FREE D.C. Movement, meanwhile, alienated supporters and wavered on home rule even after it had abandoned its request for money. Lyon and Rauh have also disavowed the boycott and the most powerful Congressional friend of district self-government, Senator Alan Bible, the Nevada Democrat who heads the Senate District Committee, called the boycott "ill-advised, ill-considered and ill-conceived."

Barry persisted and in April brought the pickets downtown, where the movement achieved one of its first victories and then was subjected to its most virulent criticism. The first downtown target was scheduled to be the Hecht Company, one of Washington's larger department stores, whose manager, Harry N. Hirshberg, Jr., is a director of the Board of Trade. Hirshberg and several other retailers had claimed that a policy of "corporate neutrality" prevented involvement in political issues (although corporation executives have been involved through the Board of Trade). A day before picketing of Hecht's was to begin, Hirshberg met with Barry, then issued a letter saying, "I personally favor the principle of home rule," and adding that he had asked the Board of Trade "to reassess and reexamine the validity of its current published position on the subject of home rule and local self-government." After the letter, the movement did not picket Hecht's and moved to Kann's, a smaller store.

The Vacuum

The reaction from the Board of Trade's president came promptly. F. Elwood Davis, a lawyer, accused the movement of "immoral, un-American, and unjust" tactics and called the boycott a "blackjack approach." "It's un-American when you try to force a merchant to agree with your political thinking and if he doesn't, you picket or boycott him," Davis said. Washington's two afternoon newspapers followed, calling the movement's tactics "just plain wrong" and "irresponsible."

Emotionalism apparently had shifted from the civil-rights cause to the other side. Episcopal Suffragan Bishop Paul Moore of the Coalition of Conscience replied that the Board of Trade's charges "are not worthy of comment in kind." Barry called the Davis statement "ranting and raving." The movement next decided to call attention to its cause by picketing the annual Cherry Blossom Festival, which attracts thousands of tourists. Barry specified no mass demonstrations, just a few "educational pickets."

The political impasse over home rule has undoubtedly been affected by the boycott, but whether favorably or not cannot be forecast. Congressmen are notably prone to get their backs up in the face of alleged intimidation. This was the argument used against the 1963 civil-rights march on Washington and other Negro demonstrations throughout the past decade. Many Congressmen today cite this argument to home-rule missionaries from the League of Women Voters, Americans for Democratic Action, and the Washington Home Rule Committee.

Despite his successful challenge of the department stores, Barry has been swept by the side effects of the "black power" controversy into a stand of opposing all relations with the "power structure." He boycotted a massive rally on the grounds of the Washington Monument in mid-July. The rally, sponsored by a variety of political and religious groups—including the D.C. Coalition of Conscience—attracted some four thousand Washingtonians on a hot Sunday afternoon. But Barry, who watched the proceedings from the rear ranks, said: "They should have had twenty times as many people here today. They've got the whole power structure of the city up there." A representative of the Urban League told the rally: "It's important that we don't begin fighting among ourselves, seeking the headlines, taking the credit. There's a place in this struggle for all of us."

Present hopes for home rule lie with a rider to a House-passed higher-education bill. The home-rule rider, attached by Senator Wayne Morse, a member of the Senate District Committee, would presumably be accepted by the Senate, where home rule passed last year, 63 to 29. Unlike last year's bill, Morse's rider calls for nonpartisan elections and a Federal payment in lieu of taxes based on a percentage of District-collected revenue rather than an automatic payment formula. Since attempts will undoubtedly be made to table the Morse rider, it will provide the up-or-down vote on the issue this year and is now the focus of lobbying by home-rule advocates.

The political vacuum remains. No speeches are made on the House floor and Senator Bible's Senate committee finds it difficult to gather a quorum. Bible's four Democratic colleagues have worked for home rule in the past but except for Morse now find themselves otherwise occupied. Robert Kennedy is busy being Robert Kennedy; Thomas McIntyre is busy being a Democrat running for re-election in New Hampshire; and Joseph Tydings has devoted time to issues of more direct concern to his Maryland constituents, such as parking problems in the District.

President Johnson, who mentioned home rule briefly in his State of the Union message, has the sympathy of one leading home-rule advocate, who says, "If I had to worry about Vietnam and inflation, I wouldn't be thinking too much of home rule, either."

Meanwhile, by-products of the political vacuum pile up. A Presidential committee on freeways could not agree on whether downtown expressways should be allowed to chop up L'Enfant's original city plan. A city planning commission report shows that nearly a fourth of the city's population lives in "abject poverty—the lowest form of deprivation."

Would these problems disappear with self-government? A political scientist's analysis would at least disclose that these conditions are aggravated by a widespread feeling of political "alienation." A working politician's analysis would be similar but blunter. President Johnson said of Watts last August 26: "The scars of years of inaction reflected themselves. And when people feel that they don't get a fair shake, when they feel that justice is not open to them, you always see these things occur. They occur in different sections at different times. Those of you here in the District of Columbia, I want to warn you this morning that the clock is ticking, time is moving."

NEGRO POLITICS, OLD STYLE AND NEW:

I. William Dawson Calls the Tune

RICHARD COTTON

CHICAGO

THIS NOVEMBER the Negro voters of Illinois' First Congressional District will reaffirm the old order of Chicago politics, sending eighty-year-old Negro Congressman William L. Dawson back to Washington for his thirteenth consecutive term in the House of Representatives. But the forces of change are at work on Chicago's South Side. Dawson had to beat off a strong primary challenge this June from Fred Hubbard, a Negro social worker forty-three years his junior, and he won only on the strength of large pluralities run up in the poor areas of his district.

Ethnic groups in America have traditionally achieved political independence as they have risen economically. The Negro has been no exception: the middle-class Negro has been achieving much the same political sophistication that the middle-class Irish, Polish, and Italians did before him. But isolated in slums, the Negro still remains in many big cities the most dependable bulwark of the Democratic machine.

The June Democratic primary election demonstrated that the Chicago machine can still count on large majorities in lower-class Negro areas, despite the impact of the civil-rights movement. As rights leaders have turned their attention to politics, moderate Republicans and anti-machine Democrats in Chicago have talked of a new independence on the part of the poor Negro voter. When Martin Luther King and his aides arrived in Chicago last fall, hopes that Negro voters would desert the machine increased. Dawson's June victory, however, has largely crushed them.

ONE OUT OF every three Negroes in the state of Illinois lives in the First District. More than ninety per cent Negro, it carefully follows the boundaries of Chicago's South Side Negro area. The First provides almost ideal comparisons of poor and middle-class voters because it is split sharply into two different communities. The depressingly poor northern half of the district combines tenements and high-rise public housing projects; but to the south, the First becomes strikingly middle-class, with neat wire-mesh fences enclosing well-kept one- and two-family homes.

For twenty-four years, the First has been the political fiefdom of William Dawson. The shape of the district itself has changed, moving south as the Negro community expanded. But its organization—often called the most effective in the country—has remained the same: a captain and two assistants for every one of its 446 precincts, and whenever possible, a worker for every block or large building. Each of the seven ward offices assumes responsibility for its precinct captains, and Dawson's Second Ward office sends out campaign materials and instructions to the other six.

Dawson's organization is a semi-autonomous cog in the machine of Chicago's Democratic Mayor Richard J. Daley, and Dawson is vice-chairman of the Cook County Democratic Central Committee. Second only to Chairman Daley, Dawson's importance to the mayor can hardly be overestimated. In 1963, Daley defeated his Republican opponent, Benjamin Adamowski, by 139,000 votes; Negro wards provided about 115,000 of that margin.

Unlike Daley, who has remolded much of his machine in deference to Republican businessmen and middle-class voters, Dawson has not changed his organization since he was first elected to Chicago's city council in the early 1930's. In the June primary, mimeographed leaflets called local Negroes to rallies with the promise that "a dollar a minute will be given away." Between every two speeches in a dingy slum movie house, one of Chicago's Negro aldermen raffled away crisp twenty-dollar bills to the cheering crowd. During the machine's blitz-like campaign, only seven rallies were held. "You can't have meetings all the time. You have to give people time to work in their precincts," said Dawson's administrative assistant, Lawrence Woods.

A Service Organization

And Congressman Dawson's men do work. This June the machine offered $1,000 in rewards for the precinct captains who brought in the most votes: $500 for the one who brought in the highest number, $300 for second, and $200 for third. All precinct captains were told that they were expected to bring in at least three hundred votes. (And to the machine, a vote means a straight Democratic vote; it is not interested in split tickets.) Many a patronage job depends on the ability of these captains to produce.

The Dawson machine rarely worries about the accuracy of what it prints. One of Dawson's newsletters, which was heavily distributed throughout the district, carried a startling quote from the President: "I am a DAWSON man. Nothing will ever make me forget William L. Dawson is the man most responsible for my becoming President of the United States." Small cardboard tickets are printed, reading, "To the Judges of Election: I am unfamiliar with the operation of the voting machine. I want to vote for the Democratic candidates."

Jobs, however, provide the organization's most effective leverage. As Woods explained Dawson's philosophy to me: "We are a service organization; that's our strength. We have more people in that district for us because we have helped them." He had just promised a constituent a stenographer's job in the local War on Poverty office.

This spring, Dawson did run a little scared for once. He put up billboards throughout the district picturing him with President Johnson, held a massive "Dawson Day" at a Chicago amusement park, and put in several appearances at the ward rallies in his honor. For Dawson, who usually doesn't so much as make a public appearance, it was a hard campaign.

The opponent who managed to throw a little fear into "The Man," as Dawson is known on the South Side, was Fred Hubbard, a tall, good-looking Negro who grew up in the slums of the First. Before deciding to run for Congress, Hubbard worked for eight years with teen-aged gang members as a YMCA social worker, accumulating a card file of contacts and friends. During the primary, he attempted to build an organization of his own, recruiting volunteer workers for nearly every precinct in the district. Although he had little money, he opened three offices and campaigned in a style unknown to the South Side. He attended parlor meetings, renewed acquaintances in the housing projects, and shook hands with people on the street.

Hubbard based much of his chance for success on the effects of the civil-rights movement. His hopes were bolstered when Martin Luther King announced in mid-May a week-long drive to register Negro voters. But Chicago was in the midst of the coldest spring in a decade, and during King's registration drive, temperatures plunged into the forties. A cold, freezing rain whipped the city intermittently for the entire week. Only small crowds turned out for the registration rallies, which had been hastily moved indoors, and the campaign went virtually unnoticed in the Chicago newspapers.

Nevertheless, political observers viewed Hubbard's challenge to the machine as the strongest it had ever faced. On a sunny June 14, Dawson's precinct captains brought in their standard forty-one thousand votes. Hubbard could muster only twenty-four thousand. But while he was trounced in the poor areas where he thought he knew the people, he carried the district's three middle-class wards.

After the election, Hubbard admitted that his friendships did him little good. "I discovered that it is very difficult for a poor, semi-literate Negro, unfamiliar with a voting machine, to vote successfully against the organization. The party machine owns the polls. Many people who wanted to vote for me were not able to do so, and many people just did not vote. The turnout was terrifically low." Whatever the reason, the machine maintained a stranglehold on the poor voter.

THE WARD-BY-WARD vote documents the story. In the Eighth Ward, where the median family income is about $7,200 a year, Hubbard defeated Dawson handily, winning 4,864 votes to Dawson's 3,327. But in the Third Ward, which includes some of the worst slums and biggest housing projects in Chicago (one-third of the families have an income totaling less than $3,000 a year), Dawson ran up 11,626 votes to Hubbard's 2,725.

The rejection of Dawson by the middle class was clear enough. Lest there be any mistake, a maverick Negro alderman, Charles Chew, won the Democratic nomination for state senator from the Twenty-Ninth District (a solidly middle-class Negro area) over a hand-picked machine candidate, also a Negro, Russell DeBow. DeBow had been Mayor Daley's administrative assistant, and his defeat was as much a defeat for Daley as for Dawson. Chew's bitterly fought victory ensures that a number of anti-machine candidates in middle-class areas will challenge organization aldermen in next spring's municipal election.

The middle class represents, however, only thirty per cent of Chicago's Negro population, and Dawson's victory demonstrates that the party machine is still solidly in control of the votes of the less fortunate seventy per cent. If Chicago is a fair example, the impact of the civil-rights revolution on politics will not really be felt until the Negro's economic position is improved.

II. Boycott and Ballot

HENRY HURT

JACKSON, MISSISSIPPI

THE DEBATE over black power, the alarming cry that has swept the country this summer, has so far stirred less publicity and anxiety in Mississippi than in the North. In fact, Mississippi's Negro leadership has been generally immune to the appeals of the extremists. Since Negroes make up forty-two per cent of the state's population, their potential strength is very real indeed. In terms of political and economic pressure, no one has used that potential with more success than has Charles Evers, the Mississippi field secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Evers feels that what radical civil-rights leaders like Stokely Carmichael of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee are really advocating is black supremacy, and he is one of Mississippi's firmest opponents of the idea. At the Jackson rally that ended the recent James Meredith march, the extremists prevented him from speaking, presumably because of his views on the matter. "I was here long before they came," Evers commented, "and I'll be here a long time after they're gone." He is probably right. In less than one year, he has assumed political control over three Mississippi counties, and his influence is steadily increasing. As Kenneth L. Dean, the white director of the Mississippi Council on Human Relations, remarked, "Evers has already done what Carmichael is talking about."

Jeffersonian Democracy

In the counties of Jefferson, Claiborne, and Wilkinson, all of which lie along the Mississippi River in the southern part of the state, Negroes outnumber whites by about three to one. Until a year ago, there was no NAACP branch in the area and virtually no Negro organization of any kind.

Jefferson County provides the best example of what Evers has done. For the most part, Jefferson Negroes were employed only as laborers and domestics, and less than a hundred were registered voters. All police officers were white, all store clerks were white, all officials were white, service stations had third toilets for Negroes of both sexes, and there was little communication between the Negro and white leaders.

Last October, Evers, who had been working out of Jackson, formed a NAACP branch in Fayette, the Jefferson county seat, which promptly took in members by the hundreds. Just before Christmas, he announced that a complete economic boycott would be waged against the white merchants in Jefferson County, and that not a black cent would be spent in any white-owned store until a list of Negro demands was met. (Such tactics have proved highly profitable for Negro store owners, and Evers, always a good businessman himself, has done very nicely with a food store he purchased during a previous series of boycotts.) By June of this year the boycott had been lifted from nearly all the establishments. Of sixteen stores, eleven had hired Negro salesclerks. Three stores were so small that Evers agreed they couldn't afford any additional help, and two stores are still being boycotted. Eight of the nine service stations in the area had closed the third toilet and made previously segregated facilities available to Negroes. The Jefferson County Hospital was desegregated. In Fayette, a Negro had been hired to serve as one of the town's two policemen, and the sheriff had hired a Negro deputy to share duties with a white man.

Evers says this is not merely "token desegregation." He claims that there is now a spirit of "cooperation and friendliness" between whites and blacks, and that white officials are willing to talk to Negro leaders at any time. More than economic pressures were at work. During the boycott of white merchants, Evers and his helpers were spending their days and nights canvassing the county in an effort to persuade reluctant Negroes to register to vote. Their efforts were outstandingly successful: Negro registration has rocketed to about 3,500, and they now outnumber whites on the voting lists by the same ratio as they do in population figures.

CHARLES EVERS, it is generally agreed in Fayette, has absolute control of the Negro vote in Jefferson County and is now in a position to secure every elective office in the county for the men of his choice.

A massively built man with a spontaneous laugh, Evers seems to enjoy his power. Sitting in his well-furnished Fayette office and wearing a red polo shirt, he reached for a telephone and said, "Here, I'll show you how we get along with the whites around here." He dialed the mayor's home with no success. Then he called R. K. Pritchard, the chief deputy sheriff. (Pritchard has served a term as county sheriff, and since the law forbids two successive terms, his wife is now installed in the senior post in a sort of Lurleen Wallace gambit.)

The conversation is friendly and Evers says, "Sheriff, I see old Cohn still has that rebel flag hanging on the front of his store. I told you to tell him to take that thing down." Evers's end of the conversation indicates that Pritchard had approached the white store owner on the matter. Then Evers laughs and says, "You say it's a Mississippi state flag? Well, it looks pretty rebelish to me. You tell Cohn we want that flag down, and then we gonna get along fine."

As the conversation ends, Evers says, "Sheriff, you see how easy it is after all the hell we went through? We gonna make this the best county in the country, ain't we?" Pritchard apparently agrees, and after Evers hangs up he reports that Pritchard will try once more to persuade the storekeeper to take down the Mississippi flag.

In an interview later, Pritchard said that he and Evers "get along fine." In explaining race relations in Jefferson County, Pritchard said, "We been living here together all our lives, and there's no reason why we won't keep on."

Pritchard, who will again be eligible after his wife's term, plans to run for sheriff again in the next election. He thinks he will win without any trouble. He expects to have Evers's support, and Evers is planning now to give it—providing Pritchard agrees to appoint a Negro chief deputy.

Evers, who has established his residence in Jefferson County, insists that he has no intention of running for office himself. Nor has he any plans for an all-black slate of officers in the next election. He wants a suitable white sheriff, presumably Pritchard, who will train a Negro chief deputy for four years. He is happy with the present white mayor, but wants a Negro police chief; and he wants two Negroes on the board of aldermen and two Negroes on the board of supervisors.

A Road That All May Travel

Describing his ultimate aims in Jefferson County, Evers told me: "We're going to get rid of all the racists and bigots. They're going —there's no question about that. But we're against any sort of exclusion. We want to make this an example of how Negroes and whites can live and work together as men and women." Some of the initial steps he advocates are the establishment of as many Federal poverty programs as possible and a serious start toward real desegregation of the public schools.

Evers is not confining his efforts to Jefferson. The adjoining counties of Claiborne and Wilkinson also have about three times more Negroes than whites and in each a substantially greater number of Negro voters than whites are now registered as a direct result of Evers's efforts. In Claiborne a boycott is already in effect and one is planned for Wilkinson. Concessions similar to those won in Jefferson have been made in nearby Adams County—which includes Natchez, one of the chief focal points in the state of recent racial strife—even though slightly more whites than Negroes are registered there.

Evers is almost contemptuous of groups that favor all-black anything. The Black Panther Party, the Alabama political group organized by SNCC, draws his sharpest reaction. "We don't allow them in here. There will be no Black Panther Party in this county. Even their name 'Panther' means something that destroys." He also has little patience with the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party, an almost entirely Negro group that claims to be the

PAGINATION INCORRECT

"real" Democratic Party in the state. Even though he swung his weight behind the FDP candidates during the June Democratic primary and provided them with the only two counties that gave them a majority, this was not intended as a sign of approval; Evers simply felt that the FDP offered candidates more acceptable to the Negro voters than the regular Democrats. (In the June Democratic primary the FDP front runner for the Senate received less than fifteen per cent of the vote on a statewide basis.)

"The FDP is not coming into these counties and holding meetings on their own," Evers claims. "We're on the right road, and I'm not going to let them in here. We're not going off on some wild-goose chase trying to create some third party." He says he has no objections to the Young Democrats organizing chapters in the area, however. This biracial group has been granted an official charter by the Young Democratic Clubs of America, and Evers maintains that, unlike the Black Panthers or the FDP, they represent a legitimate political organization.

His stand is in direct opposition to that of Lawrence Guyot, the FDP chairman, who feels that Negroes who are willing to participate in the regular Democratic Party or the Young Democratic Clubs can be managed by whites.

THE NAACP clearly agrees with Evers's viewpoint. Aaron Henry, the Clarksdale druggist who has been state president of the NAACP during most of the racial strife in Mississippi, told me: "I get the idea black power is reverse racism and that it suggests that the Negro community should now begin to treat the white community as the white community has treated the Negro community all these years. I believe the black power syndrome will become as extinct as the hula hoop craze."

As Evers points out about the nation as a whole, "Never will ten per cent of the population be able to outdo ninety per cent." He believes that "That dollar and that ballot are the greatest weapons we got." The work he has done in the southwestern counties along the river seems to bear him out.

The Availability of Richard Nixon

JULES WITCOVER

IN BIRMINGHAM'S spacious Municipal Auditorium, a sweeping spotlight played on Richard M. Nixon as he strode down the center aisle among twelve hundred cheering partisans at the largest fund-raising dinner in the short history of Alabama Republicanism. John Grenier, the party's 1966 candidate for U.S. Senator and a leading Southern organizer for Barry Goldwater in 1964, took the microphone and recalled that "Birmingham gave its heart and sixty per cent of its votes" to Nixon in 1960. If fate chooses him "to lead this great country from the swampland of socialism to the bright sunshine of liberty" in 1968, Grenier proclaimed, "the electoral vote of Alabama will be cast for Dick Nixon." The crowd, at fifty dollars a plate, roared its approval.

One night earlier in Tulsa, at a cocktail party for oilmen contributing to the Republican Party, Mayor James M. Hewgley, Jr., had climbed on a patio chair and presented Nixon with a key to the city and a promise that Tulsa, which gave him sixty-three per cent of its vote in 1960, would make it "seventy per cent next time." And shortly afterward, before 850 festive Republicans at the ultramodern Tulsa Assembly Center, Tulsa County G.O.P. Chairman Bert McElroy had assured the former Vice President that "Tulsa has been, is, and will be again a Nixon city." This crowd, at only twenty-five dollars a plate, was equally enthusiastic.

On all three occasions, and many others like them during his most recent eleven-day cross-country political swing, non-candidate Nixon expressed gratitude for the sentiments but urged the faithful to "forget about 1968 for now and concentrate on 1966." The question of his own chances in 1968, raised invariably at press conferences along the way, received a stock answer: "I respectfully decline to comment, because there is nothing that divides a party like contesting for the Presidency. At a time when the Democrats with their huge numbers are divided, it's time for the Republicans to be unified. I will not discuss 1968. Others may if they wish."

Others, of course, do wish to speculate.

Nixon has spoken in thirty states in the past year; shortly after Labor Day, he plans to carry his missionary work for party unity to fifty marginal Congressional districts now held by Democrats. If, as he predicts, Republicans win forty of these closely contested races, the G.O.P. will be well along the road toward rehabilitation as a contending national party in 1968. And as a man who helped make it happen, Nixon certainly wouldn't be hurt by such an outcome.

DESPITE NIXON'S adherence to the traditional off-year posture of non-candidacy, his strategy for a second run at the Presidency already is visible and well advanced. Nixon's formula for the 1960 campaign—a tireless display of calculated selflessness—is his formula again in 1966. Then, he put the party, its candidates, and its local organizations in his political debt by working un-

Dear Mr. Olive:

Enclosed please find our report covering the period from June 27, 1966 to August 19, 1966. May I thank you for your cooperation in providing our branch with financial assistance in our recent Voter Registration Drive and Get-Out-The-Vote Campaign. We are reasonably sure that if it had not been for your organization's help, we would have been unable to secure the success that was accomplished.

Since our primary in July, our office found it necessary to purge our qualified voter registration list. In our last mailing used to inform the voters to get out and vote, several hundred pieces of mail was returned to us. This was caused by persons who have moved due to road building and urban renewal programs. Most of the people involved have not bothered to change their addresses at the registrar's office but returned to vote at their old precincts. The expense incurred was to employ our secretary for a half day to do this job. Further, may I inform you that we have been successful in getting one of the labor unions to agree to use their IBM machines to assist us in mailing. This job was being done by volunteers, which was quite a job for getting out more than 30,000 pieces of mail. Here, again, we found it necessary to purge the list. I am sure you will agree this assistance will take a lot of headaches away.

We are preparing to launch a vigorous six to seven week voter registration drive to secure at least 5,000 new voters. Then a Get-Out-The-Vote Campaign for our November election.

Since the successful primary, hostile forces under the name of the Conservative Party of Virginia, are working night and day, spending large sums of money in an attempt to defeat the liberal candidates in November with their candidates. This group is made up of John Birches, Klu Klux Klansmen, Minute Men, White Citizens Council and others.

Again, may I thank you for your cooperation.

Very truly yours,

Open Housing Stressed:

Executive Council Pledges Fight on Rights' Filibuster

Chicago—The AFL-CIO will do "everything in our power" to help break a Senate filibuster of the House-passed civil rights bill and called on all Americans "who believe in the principle of open housing" to join in the fight.

The Federation's Executive Council pledged its position in a statement analyzing the House civil rights act of 1966 and warning that it could not become law unless the filibuster is cracked.

Emphasizing the section on fair housing as "probably the single most important section" of the measure, the council declared that the compromise on open-occupancy provisions reached in the House "contains less than we wanted and less than justice demands, but by establishing the principle of fair housing it makes a significant start."

Noting that the provisions of the bill meet the "major objectives" of the recent AFL-CIO convention resolution on civil rights, the council declared that the housing section guarantees the basic principle of fair housing, that it applies to an estimated 40 percent of the nation's homes as well as to all new housing developments and high-rise apartments, and that it was the "strongest possible" section "that could have been passed in the House."

The AFL-CIO "supported without apologies" the compromise, the council said, because without it "there would have been no open-housing section at all."

The House-passed bill also contained provisions assuring non-discrimination in the selection of federal and state juries, broadening federal laws against acts of

Test for Schoolmen: action on INTEGRATION

by Harold Howe II

The invitation to this conference outlined two topics for discussion: first, the prospects of obtaining public support for integrated, quality education; second, the feasibility of integrated, quality education.

That agenda has a fine ring to it. The word "feasibility" has five syllables, thus assuring everyone that this will be an intellectual affair, carried out on a high plane by gentlemen wearing shirts, ties, suitcoats and perhaps Phi Beta Kappa keys. I was pleased to receive an invitation to join your company and sat down soon after receiving it to compose some gentlemanly, five-syllable thoughts.

And then James Meredith was shot down on a road in Mississippi. Paradoxically, I heard of this event just a few minutes after I left a meeting with Secretary John Gardner, Roy Wilkins of the NAACP and a number of civil rights leaders accompanying Mr. Wilkins. We were discussing our progress in school and hospital desegregation. And I started to wonder whether civil rights was any place for a gentlemanly discussion. I am beginning to suspect that it is not; in any case I have the feeling that those of us who think of ourselves as gentlemen should either stop pretending that we care about racial equality or we should step down from our air-conditioned podiums and start something definite in the way of a program. Considering the authority that we gentlemanly education officials have at our command to correct racial injustice in our schools, I feel that we have accomplished very little so far.

We have, to be sure, gotten a fair amount of newspaper space and published enough committee reports on the inequalities of segregated education to build a paper Tower of Babel. Nothing is safer these days than denouncing bigotry. But I find myself puzzling over which is worse, honest bigotry or well-intentioned timidity.

While we have gone on urging moderation, sweet reason and bigger and better panel discussions, the schools throughout the nation remain almost as segregated today as they were in 1954, when the Supreme Court decided that racially segregated education was illegal. The small progress that the South has made toward desegregation has been offset by increasing de facto segregation in the cities of the North. Since 1954, an entire sub-generation of Negro and white youngsters who started first grade in that year has now graduated from high school . . . most without any classroom experience with the other race. The facts today are that a Negro youngster in an American elementary school has on the national average not much more than 15 percent of his classmates from the majority white groups; in the southern states the figure is nearer to 5 percent; white high school students can expect to have nine out of ten of their classmates from their own white group. The picture does not inspire calm satisfaction.

Our words have urged the nation to desegregate its schools. But our reluctance to act has said even louder, "not yet." Somehow we seem to have been lulled into a blind faith in gradualism, a mindless confidence that some morning, some year, a suddenly transformed electorate will spontaneously and joyously decide that this is the day to integrate America.

Well, it is not going to happen. For a variety of reasons—one or two of them arguable, the rest pure rationalization—the majority of American whites display no likelihood of becoming enthusiastic about school desegregation and the changes it demands in the immedate future. The law of this land nevertheless beckons every one of us, calling on us to recognize that desegregating the schools is our legal responsibility, that it will not be easy work, and that it is futile to expect the years to erode those passions that today make the processes of desegregation unpopular.

HAROLD HOWE II is U.S. Commissioner of Education, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. He delivered this address June 18 before the School Administrators' Conference sponsored by the National Urban League and Columbia University's Teachers College.

EDUCATION News and Views

Gradualism—no matter what we call it—has failed and I think it is fair to say that those who continue to espouse it are fooling themselves and, in many ways, failing our nation.

It seems to me time for school officials to form a third front for racial equality in the United States.

At one end of the civil rights movement today we have the gradualists, both white and Negro, a polite and sometimes sluggish team, deeply respectful of the public and sometimes given to assuring each other that it is possible to make an omelette without breaking eggs. At the other end are the activists, both the non-violent demonstrators and those weary and desperate Americans who have come to feel that violence is the only way to get anything done.

The failure of the gradualists would seem at bottom to be fear . . . fear of rocking a boat which, no matter how leaky, appears at least to be floating somewhere. The failure of the activists is that while they know in general terms what they want to achieve and are willing to pay a heavy price to obtain it, they have neither the position in society nor the professional's knowledge of the means and importance of advancing racial equality within the framework of law.

School officials have both position and knowledge. Those of us professionally engaged in education are charged with setting educational policy within our respective jurisdictions and we are familiar with a variety of methods that can be used to advance school desegregation. What we have often lacked is a productive commitment.

I say productive because for all our recognition of the importance of school desegregation to our society, the fact remains that we have not achieved much of it. I say commitment because achieving desegregation does not require fury or breastbeating. It does require something much more important: the recognition that school desegregation must be accomplished and the determination to do it.

Our task obviously requires an activity more sophisticated than the gritting of our corporate teeth. School officials occupy a curious position somewhere between that of the educational leader and the political leader. But it is apparent that for many administrators, a necessary sensitivity to public opinion has tended so to dilute their sense of responsibility for educational leadership that they have exercised it only after the public parade has already decided what way it wants to go.

This may sound to many educators as an unfair and overdrawn indictment. The record clearly shows that school officials today are making remarkable strides toward improving American education. They are coming up with new ideas and accepting the risk inherent in all experimentation.

But to win public support for such advances as team teaching, modern curriculum, language laboratories, ungraded classrooms, closed-circuit television and computerized instruction is not enough. We must at the same time desegregate the schools. To do otherwise is to accept the shadow of educational leadership in place of its substance. School desegregation is the single point on which we who call ourselves educational leaders prove that we really are so . . . or demonstrate that we are merely trying to keep things quiet until we receive our gold watches for a lifetime devoted to the status quo.

The fact is that no matter how hard we try, we will not be able to keep things quiet. A revolution is brewing under our feet and it is largely up to the schools to determine whether the energies of that revolution can be converted into a new and vigorous source of American progress, or whether the explosion will rip this nation into two societies. We simply cannot wait until dramatic action becomes safe, for at this point it is much less dangerous to make a mistake than to do nothing.

Feeding that revolution is a major shift in American folkways. Today, approximately two of every three adult Negroes living in the North was born and raised in the South. This move has necessarily had a major impact—often a bewildering impact—on the individual. In some ways, the life he left in the South was less segregated than it is in the North. The Negro child born in the South was, to be sure, raised on the notion that he would always occupy a subservient position . . . but it was nevertheless a subservient position within a white society.

The young northern Negro of today's city lives in a black society. He has few points of contact with whites and those few—when you reflect on them—are revealing. He is likely to encounter a white teacher, a white policeman and a white merchant. He can pass his entire adolescence without having to deal with the white world outside the ghetto and his ideas of that world are based on three types: the teacher, often a symbol of boredom and irrelevance; the policeman, a symbol of authority, if not of repression; and the merchant, often a symbol of white cunning.

And so the young Negro setting forth from the ghetto to confront this white world expects it is going to misunderstand him and oppress him and too often he finds evidence to justify his fears. It is no wonder that, if he has any spunk and imagination, he rejects the fatalism of his father and decides that it is the part of a man to change this sorry mess he inherited. And if it takes violence to change it . . . well, that's what it takes.

It is this young Negro who must be convinced that the United States is his home, not his prison, and that it is a country worth fighting for, not a cage to be fought out of. It may already be too late to change his mind. But it is not too late to provide his younger brothers and sisters with a healthier belief . . . nor too late to protect white children from the destructive stereotypes that most white adults inherited from their own segregated education.

What tools have we to demolish the wall which separates our youngest citizens? How can we prevent them from fearing each other before they have even met?

You are as familiar as I with some of the ideas that have been proposed to desegregate the schools: pairing plans that provide faculty and student exchanges between predominantly white and Negro schools; bussing to alter the racial compositions of schools in different parts of a community; educational parks that might have as many as 20,000 students drawn from every racial, economic and geographic sector of a city; supplementary centers for the special enrichment of education which bring together young people from different sides of the tracks for a common denominator of learning.

In addition, there are a number of federally-sponsored programs that offer significant help. Under Title IV of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, for example, the U.S. Office of Education provided financial assistance to school personnel and authorities to deal with the special problems resulting from desegregation.

Grants are given to school boards for training teachers and other school personnel and for the employment of specialists. Training institutes are supported to improve the ability of teachers, supervisors, counselors and other school personnel to handle desegregation problems.

Since the beginning of the Title IV program in January of 1965, applications have been received for funds totaling more than $35 million against available funds amounting to $12.3 million. The Office of Education has been able to support 59 grants amounting to $4.9 million. We have supported 115 institutes in the amount of $6.5 million. More than 7,500 teachers, supervisors, counselors and principals have benefited from the institute training alone.

Title III of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 also authorizes federal aid to school districts to help them plan and carry out new ideas for school desegregation. President Johnson added a special $5 million fund for this purpose in his message on education this year.

Title I of that same Act has the overall effect of easing the harmful educational results of school segregation, because its entire $959 million is aimed at benefiting those children who have suffered most because of the poverty that usually accompanies racial inequities. These are the estimated 5½ million children from families whose annual income is less than $2,000 a year. Here, too, after-school and summer school projects are providing the opportunity to integrate staff and students in ways that aren't possible in the regular school program.

Each of these Acts, together with the 70-odd other programs administered by the U.S. Office of Education, has been given a special thrust by the Civil Rights Act of 1965. Title VI of that Act, as you know, prohibits federal aid to any program or activity that discriminates among its recipients on the basis of race, color or national origin.

Thus the Civil Rights Act makes of every federal program, whether it be for education, urban development or water pollution control, a powerful financial tool in the drive against racial inequity. The rationale behind this Act is simple: no desegregation, no federal money.

But though the rationale may be simple, its operation is both frustrating and complex. The nation sees that frustration in the Office of Education's attempts to secure compliance with our school desegregation guidelines in the South. We in the Office see this frustration in an even more acute form in our attempts to define what constitutes racial discrimination in the cities of the North and West, where segregation depends less on stated community policy than on patterns of residence.

To say this is by no means to say that the Office of Education is caving in on de facto segregation—on segregation northern-style. It is to say that the issues are complicated and subtle, that establishing a clear-cut legal basis on which to take action—and be confident of withstanding any challenge—has required far more investigation and study than we would have preferred. We are not satisfied with our pace. But that dissatisfaction adds up not to retreat but to determination to redouble our enforcement efforts where they are pertinent.

The broad position we must all assume on this matter comprises two parallel and equally important policies. One cannot work without the other. The first is to make the schools of the central city such good schools that they attract people rather than repel them. The second is to use every possible device to include within each school a cross section of the social and economic backgrounds of the metropolis. A student should meet America in his school—not a segregated segment of it. The concept of racial balance may be impractical except as an ideal in a city with more Negroes than whites and a continuing white exodus. But keeping our eyes on that ideal can help us to do practical things now to slow the exodus and provide equal educational opportunity.

Some very practical things are now under way at the instigation of state and local officials acting on their own to make equal educational opportunity a reality . . . sometimes in the face of community opposition, but sometimes hand-in-hand with community determination to eradicate a century-old injustice.

The Denver school board, for example, has authorized double sessions at one of its high schools in order to cut class size and reduce pupil-teacher ratios to a point where teachers can use new instructional techniques to best advantage. A special pilot program of compensatory education was provided for and the administrative staff was instructed to draft plans to bus enough Negro student-volunteers to other schools to achieve better racial balance at a school that was in danger of becoming all-Negro.

Summer programs in Little Rock are fully integrated as to staff and students and are being conducted in formerly all-white schools. The Portland, Oregon, program of saturation services for inner city schools aims at producing an education program so good that it will reverse the flight of middle class whites from racially balanced schools in fringe areas.

The St. Paul school system is considering a plan to combine a rapid-transit system with a cluster of four or five 300-acre educational parks that would bring youngsters from the ghetto, from other city schools, and from parochial and suburban schools into central locations for classes ranging from nursery school through junior college. Other cities looking seriously at the possibility of similar educational parks include East Orange, N. J., Philadelphia, Pittsburgh and New York City.

In describing the St. Paul plan, School Superintendent Donald Dunnan admitted that the educational park may not be the entire answer to school desegregation. "But," he said "it is the kind of step that's needed. Everybody has been saying, 'Let's do something.' We are."

And that is the point—to do something.

But let us agree on this: that in terms of the magnitude of the task, none of these approaches—not the special arrangements made by the schools nor the programs sponsored by the federal government—is a perfect instrument for doing the job they are supposed to complete. Yet that is precisely why educators who know both the uses and the limitations of these ideas must act on them, for we must supply in courage and in action what our plans lack in ingenuity. There is no such thing as the perfect way to achieve school desegregation. There is no magic key that will unlock all the doors that private prejudice and public pressure have placed in the way of equal opportunity in education.

But the job is there to do and if any of us entered education with the idea that it would be a soft touch, this is as good a time as any to concede that we made a big mistake. There is lots of conversation about local control of the schools; if we really believe in it—and I assure you that I am in that number—we must make it work. We must guide the schools to a continuing freedom while at the same time responding appropriately to calls for national action. Local school districts must not sit on their hands and then bellow about having the reins of educational policy yanked from them.

We are in the midst of a struggle for excellent education for every American youngster and we must use every likely tool we can devise. Local school administrators must consider such means as redrawing school district boundaries and consolidating with neighboring districts for educational purposes, even though political boundaries may remain unchanged. We cannot wait for mayors and city councils to do the work they hired us to do. And sometimes we must do work they don't want us to do.

There is no point in waiting for real estate salesmen to get the message from on high and ease our job by selling homes to anyone who wants them. There is no point in our waiting for American corporations to start hiring Negro men as readily as they do light-skinned, well-dressed Negro women. Neither American home salesmen nor American personnel managers have ever insisted that they have a major responsibility for building American democracy. They have never pretended to do anything but their jobs.

American schoolmen, however, have quite properly taken a large share of the credit for establishing national unity and freedom of opportunity. Our predecessors in the classroom helped 20 million European immigrants become Americans and we haven't stopped bragging about it yet. If we are to retain that pride in our tradition, I think we must recognize that the great achievements of the past are not only a legacy, but also a heavy burden. If we want to wear the laurels, we must also carry the load.

The load we must carry is that of irritating a fair percentage of our white constituents—of embarrassing some governors and mayors, of alarming some newspaper publishers and of enraging suburban taxpayers who, in proportion to their means, are not paying as much for their good schools as paupers in the cities are paying for their bad ones.

And all this means that, finally and most grievously, we must run the risk of being invited to resign. Unless all of us are willing to put our jobs and our integrity on the line, we should admit that American educators are no longer prepared to be the prime movers in American education.

American education today is perhaps the hottest room in our national house. But we picked it out all by ourselves. To paraphrase a metaphor first wrought by President Truman, I would say that we must either adjust ourselves to the heat or let somebody else take over the kitchen.

REV. KING JOINS RWDSU CHICAGO STORE DRIVE

Chicago, Ill.—The nation's leading civil rights advocate, the Rev. Martin Luther King, has joined the Chicago Joint Board's fight for a contract for units of non-selling workers, most of whom are Negroes, at the Saks Fifth Ave. and Bonwit Teller department stores here.

The union won an NLRB bargaining election at Saks Fifth Ave. last Oct. 4, but the store has stalled on recognizing the union. The NLRB in Washington has found the store guilty of unfair labor practices and ordered it to bargain on a first contract with the Joint Board.

Dr. King, who has supported several RWDSU affiliates in campaigns, addressed a meeting of Saks workers at the Allerton Hotel Aug. 31.

"We cannot afford to allow the attitude of your employer to go unchallenged, lest we once again be denied the degree of human dignity we all richly deserve at our place of work," Dr. King told the Saks workers. "Together we can develop a course of action to obtain the rights and benefits that have long been overdue you."

Dr. King's support of the RWDSU drive gave the lie to Saks' most recent attempt to evade collective bargaining. In its appeal to the NLRB, the store claimed that if it bargained with the union for a separate, non-selling unit, it would be discriminating against the overwhelmingly Negro unit.

REV. MARTIN LUTHER KING

The irony is that although the store hired the Negro workers exclusively for non-selling jobs and consistently refused to promote Negroes into selling jobs, it went to the board and claimed to be concerned about discrimination against Negroes.

The NLRB's decision in the Saks case holds out hope the board will take similar action in the case of Bonwit Teller. The management has attempted to use its own discriminatory practices as a basis for denying the union's right to an election among an appropriate unit of the store's employees.

An election scheduled for July 20 at Bonwit's was postponed when the Joint Board filed unfair labor practice charges against the store, but the union's organizing drive is continuing.

Two leaders of District 65 in New York City, Exec. Vice-Pres. Bill Michelson and Sec.-Treas. Cleveland Robinson, have been assisting the workers' efforts to obtain contracts, along with members of the Joint Board's staff and the Industrial Union Dept. staff in Chicago. Both Michelson and Robinson, who is also president of the Negro-American Labor Council, addressed the Saks Fifth Ave. meeting. Michelson pledged the support of the workers of Gimbels and other '65' department store members.

RWDSU Record 9-4-66 Coalition RWDSU 9/

WHAT HAPPENED TO JUSTICE AT MURRAY BISCUIT?

By Charles Michaelson

AUGUSTA, Ga.—The RWDSU has organized 6,000 workers in the South in the last year and a half, and The Record has run the news of these victories. The theme of the stories is that the South is changing.

But every so often there's a reminder that the South isn't changing quite as fast as it often seems. Such a reminder occurred Aug. 11 at the Murray Biscuit Co., where the RWDSU lost an NLRB election 234 to 130, with 47 votes challenged and one void.

John Murray, the owner of the company, an unscrupulous and politically powerful man, spent $100,000 to deprive his employees of their right to decide for themselves if they wanted a union. The RWDSU has filed charges with the board, and the board has started investigations, but it is unlikely that the union will ever negotiate a contract for the Murray workers.

In November, organizers Dock Dickinson and Arthur Hullam moved from Atlanta to Augusta, a city of 80,000 some 150 miles east. They practically lived there until the vote, organizing. By early summer, they had signed cards from more than 300 of the 400 workers in the plant, and the union filed for an election with the NLRB.

Then Murray started. A month before the vote, the company brought two lawyers into the plant full-time to fight the union. In the two weeks before the election, Murray fired 20 union supporters. Three have been re-hired; the union has filed NLRB charges against the company on behalf of the other 17.

On election day, supervisors gave $5 bills to some workers and said, "Don't forget how you're going to vote."

To work on the Negro workers, who make up 30 percent of the plant force, Murray enlisted at least four Negro ministers. They made house visits to the Negro workers and gave out leaflets with abusive attacks on RWDSU leaders at the plant gates.

One minister was asked by a colleague why he was working for Murray.

"I took the money and I'm going to do the job they're paying me to do," he said.

After the vote, the RWDSU called the attention of the AFL-CIO's Civil Rights Dept. to the ministers' actions. As a result, the RWDSU has been told that if it reopens the Murray campaign, it will have the active support of "Operation Breadbasket," a civil rights and voter registration drive in the Negro community.

Police, Too

Murray had another, even stronger weapon than the ministers—the police. As a member of the Augusta city council and head of the city's civil service commission, he controls the police force, and shortly before the election a number of policemen, in uniform and out, would appear occasionally across the street from the plant.

"Murray can get his employees out of any kind of trouble," Int'l Rep. Guy Dickinson said, "and he can get them into trouble, too."

In the end, Murray won.

The union has filed objections to the company's actions in the campaign—which Dickinson called the worst he has seen in his ten years as a staff man—and asked the board to find that Murray destroyed the union's majority, and to order Murray to recognize the RWDSU and bargain with the union.

And, finally, it has asked the NLRB to go into Federal court for a "10-j" injunction, under which the court orders the company to stop its anti-union activities.

The board is investigating and considering the union's requests.

The outlook at Murray is uncertain at best. It will probably be weeks or months before a complaint is issued or a hearing convened; it will be more months before a preliminary finding is handed down or workers are returned to their jobs, and it will be much longer than that before the fear is gone at Murray.

The Poverty Chain

THE DIRECT LINK between the "pattern of poverty," lack of job skills, discrimination and unemployment has been firmly established in a government survey of the nation's 100 largest poverty areas.

The Labor Dept. reported, in releasing the August employment figures, that earlier in the year a study of these poverty areas showed jobless rates about twice as high as for non-poverty sections.

The study came up with hard evidence that inadequate education and training bore down heavily on both whites and Negroes with the added factor of discrimination increasing the burden on the Negroes.

The poverty centers in 100 large cities show Negroes in far greater numbers than warranted by their percentage of the population. There are 12 million Americans who live in these areas, representing a labor force of 6.5 million of whom 45 percent are Negro, although Negroes represent only about 12 percent of the population.

WHILE THE JOBLESS rates in the poverty areas are about twice as high as for non-poverty sections, the difference grows even wider for the Negro. In March 1966 the Negro unemployment rate in the poverty sections was 9.4 percent compared to 3.8 percent in non-poverty locations. The rate of unemployment for Negro boys was 31 percent and for Negro girls 46 percent.

Negroes in the poverty areas hold the unskilled or semi-skilled jobs while in other parts of the country there is need of workers with skills and training. In the poverty areas only 18 percent of Negroes had white collar jobs, 49 percent had blue collar jobs and 34 percent low-wage service jobs.

Within the poverty areas the Negroes suffered in comparison with their white neighbors. The white workers held only 14 percent of the service jobs and 35 percent of the white collar jobs.

THE ABOVE figures point up the August job statistics showing that Negroes and unskilled workers generally are not sharing in the employment gains made during the past year. In fact, over the past four months the rate of unemployment for these groups has been increasing.

One of the results is to knock out the optimistic prediction of Labor Dept. experts earlier in the year that the unemployment rate would drop to 3.5 percent by the end of 1966. The rate has

THE ABOVE figures point up the August job statistics showing that Negroes and unskilled workers generally are not sharing in the employment gains made during the past year. In fact, over the past four months the rate of unemployment for these groups has been increasing.

One of the results is to knock out the optimistic prediction of Labor Dept. experts earlier in the year that the unemployment rate would drop to 3.5 percent by the end of 1966. The rate has remained fairly constant at the 4 percent level for the past eight months.

The basic problem, however, is to couple programs of increased education and training with higher minimum wages and greater job opportunities—to provide those in the poverty areas with a decent minimum standard of living. That means good jobs at good wages in a growing economy.

In Lecture at 'Ole Miss':

Labor-Negro Alliance Sought By Mississippi Union Leader

The following is excerpted from an address by Claude Ramsey, president of the Mississippi AFL-CIO, to an institute in history at the University of Mississippi.

IN A NEGATIVE sort of way, the Negro has dominated Mississippi politics for many years. Instead of running for or against issues affecting the economic welfare of the people, most candidates have been elected on their ability to use the race issue. The reason for this of course centers around the fact that very few Negroes were allowed to use the ballot. For years we had the most stringent voter qualification laws of any state in the nation. These laws, supposedly, were designed to keep the Negro from voting. In actuality, they kept the number of qualified voters down to a bare minimum.

Without question, the system of government in these United States is the best yet devised by man. While our two major political parties leave much to be desired, their very existence has brought stability to our government down through the years. In reviewing the political history of our state, it is necessary in my opinion to acknowledge that many of our present day problems stem from the absence of a two-party system.

This began in 1890 when James K. Vardaman first established the "Closed Society." Vardaman's ideas were actually a closed political system that excluded Negroes from the polling place and at the same time eliminated the Republican Party from the state. For 70 years Vardaman's ideas prevailed. They prevailed, in large part, because the Republican Party was Lincoln's party and any one who even thought about voting Republican was branded as a traitor to the state and to the South.

During Franklin D. Roosevelt's second term, cracks began to appear in the one-party Democratic South. When Roosevelt was first elected in 1932, he received a vast majority of the southern vote, including those in Mississippi. The same thing occurred four years later but at the end of his second term, voices of dissent were beginning to be heard. The reason for this dissent was simple. Roosevelt was showing concern for the plight of the American Negro. Harry Truman continued Roosevelt's policies when he took over after FDR's death in 1945 and, as a result, Mississippi and several other states bolted the Democratic Party in 1948. As we all know the third party movement of that year was designed to prevent Truman's election. The people behind this movement felt Truman had to have the South to win. He proved them wrong and things have never been the same since.

THE GUBERNATORIAL ELECTION of 1964 marked the end to a one-party system in the State of Mississippi. Rubel Phillips may never be governor of this state but I predict he will have a place in Mississippi history. When Phillips received almost 40 percent of the vote in that election, he assured a two-party system in our state from that point on. The Goldwater vote in the presidential election further established this fact. After generations of voting the straight Democratic ticket, no matter who the candidate, the people of this state finally decided they could vote Republican without becoming contaminated.

My major concern at this time centers around the fact that we are now in danger of becoming a one-party Republican state. As I view the situation, organized labor and the newly enfranchised Negroes are the only forces around to prevent it from happening.

As already stated, the Negro has played a negative role in Mississippi politics for many years. Instead of a negative role, he will be playing a positive one in the near future. We in the AFL-CIO intend to see that he does play a positive role.

Twenty-six counties in Mississippi have a Negro population majority. Many of labor's worst enemies in the Mississippi Legislature live in these counties. We have very few members residing in these counties; if these people are removed from office, it will have to be done with the Negro vote. To a large degree our legislative program is dependent upon our ability to form political alliances with these people. This we are trying to do. The enemies of the labor movement in this state know this and are working overtime to keep it from coming about. These enemies can be found in both the white and Negro communities.

For years we have been doing battle with the "radical right" in this state. Today we are faced with a similar problem from the "radical left" that has attached itself to the Negro community. We intend to meet this challenge also. The AFL-CIO has always resisted any group or element that would subvert our system of government. We intend to continue that policy in Mississippi.

Labor & Votes

AFL-CIO Plans Biggest Off-Year Election Push Ever for 1966 Campaign

It Sees Trouble for Liberals In Congress, Frets About Backlash Among Unionists

Leaders Form 'Task Forces'

By JOHN A. GRIMES
Staff Reporters of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON — Labor's political strategists, worried over rank-and-file disaffection on racial and inflation issues, are struggling extra-hard to drum up November votes for liberal candidates, mainly Democrats.

AFL-CIO President George Meany is now exhorting union chiefs across the country to get themselves and their members more deeply involved in the Congressional elections. "We're getting cooperation from guys we never could score with before," claims one Federation politico. Mr. Meany also has assigned two task forces of union leaders to put added oomph into labor's efforts to help defeat GOP gubernatorial candidate Ronald Reagan in California and to re-elect old Democratic friend Paul Douglas to the Senate from Illinois.

Half a hundred representatives of various unions have been allocated to individual Congressmen, mostly Democrats, to aid their re-election efforts. Besides helping get out the vote, these operatives are tending to such campaign "nuts and bolts" as getting literature printed and distributed, recordings made and meetings set up. A week-long training session in Washington preceded their deployment. It's the first time such an operation has been so early and been so thoroughly organized.

Manning the Phones

In key political battlegrounds, union volunteers are manning banks of telephones, talking to union members earlier and more often than usual to learn what they are thinking and how they will vote. "Then we can advise the candidate on how and where he has to work, and plan our literature to help him," says an AFL-CIO aide.

Come Election Day, the phones will be manned again to make sure that union members backing the Federation's favorites get to the polls. "In some areas, this kind of thing can supply the margin of victory," reasons a union official.

In certain parts of the country, names and addresses of union members are being fed into computers to prepare rosters of registered voters from which door-to-door canvassers can work, to provide phone lists for Election-Day calling, and to make possible direct mailings of campaign literature addressed by name to individual union members at home. The aims: To take the sometimes hit-and-miss drudgery out of the task of reaching voters and to free campaign workers for personal voter-contact efforts.

In these and other ways, the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education (COPE) is seeking to crank its political machinery to a rate unprecedented for a non-Presidential election year. Fearing shrinkage of the huge liberal Democratic majorities in Congress, COPE sees a crisis at hand.

Focus on Freshmen

Some 70 House contests and 15 Senate races are given high priority by Federation officials. The biggest effort will go to help 48 freshmen Democratic Congressmen who were narrowly elected in 1964 and whose votes got high marks on AFL-CIO score sheets. More or less typical is Rep. John Gilligan of Ohio, who is trying to fend off the comeback bid of former GOP Rep. Robert Taft, Jr.

It was these lawmakers, union publications keep emphasizing, who helped provide the margin of victory for much of President Johnson's labor-backed Great Society program: Medicare, aid to education, minimum wage liberalization and the like. (Union failure to win "right to work" repeal and relaxation of construction picketing restrictions are played down.) Averaging out the votes of 59 Congressmen, mostly freshmen, on 11 issues, one union publication declares: "If you had a .934 hitter, you'd keep him in the lineup."

A loss of 20 to 25 Democratic House seats, labor politicians figure, would severely crimp union ability to wring from Congress further gains in health, welfare and civil rights legislation. "And that's the minimum loss figure I hear talked about," remarks an AFL-CIO aide.

Along with statistics showing shrinkage in Congressional holdings of the majority party in most off-year elections, AFL-CIO officials are unnerved by recent setbacks in primary voting and by other omens. A COPE staff memo giving Mr. Meany and others a state-by-state rundown of prospects has turned many faces grim. "Anywhere you look, we're in trouble," groans a COPE official.

Black Power or Human Power?

When there are enough problems and headaches for everyone already, and there is plenty of difficulty in establishing a dialogue between our community and a large section of the white community, it isn't a wise idea to introduce new words or concepts which makes it harder for everyone concerned.

And that's what the all too simple, and catch-all phrase "black power" has done to the debate on how and where we make our next gains and with whom. I've listened to many different Negro leaders discuss this phrase "black power" on nationwide TV, and I've read about it, and I'm sure of one thing. There is so much confusion about what it means or was supposed to mean that at least some of the young leaders who talked about it now say they don't want to discuss it. It is now a "private matter."

I'm sure that any readers who have followed the events in Chicago, and elsewhere, and heard the young white gangs respond "white power" to the cries of black power can see that our difficult struggles haven't been helped by shouting the slogan "black power."

Both Rev. Martin Luther King and a labor leader like Walter Reuther have declared they don't believe in white power or black power, but in human power, the power of human beings to solve their problems through their struggles as human beings, and this is what I buy as a good approach.

Of course, there are all kinds of power: political, economic, social, military—the list is long, and nobody has a monopoly forever on any of it. But it's one thing to talk about our political power . . . and each election in Detroit shows we have some in our community, and it's another thing to suggest that this can be total black power. It just doesn't make sense in view of our experiences here.

We ought to use our economic power more, and we need more economic power which our people can get only through jobs at decent pay, but that doesn't mean we'll ever match the money power of General Motors or Ford. We can have some effect by what we buy and where we buy it, but only within limits.

I think, in fact I know, that the moral power of Rev. Martin Luther King proved stronger than the police power of Bull Conner, in Birmingham. That doesn't mean that moral power is going to win everytime . . . it's got a long way to go in Cicero, Illinois, but it does point out that we have to use different kinds of power, at different times to make gain.

And all these powers are greater when we have with us a segment of the labor movement or the white community or both. And when the white church leaders join with our leaders in making protest in behalf of progress.

When I see how a young white Catholic priest in Milwaukee leads our struggle and gets some results, I wonder how the advocates of black power feel. And have they forgotten that at Selma, Alabama, it was the coalition of whites and Negroes who made the marches . . . and that many white civil rights leaders as well as Negroes have been murdered in the struggles. Surely it does a disservice to their memory to ignore their contribution, and to say that we alone have or can do the job.

The cry of black power is one of despair at the rate of progress, and there are times to despair. It is a cry of frustration, and God knows there are many frustrations. Of course we understand it, but that doesn't make it right. For it has divided rather than united. It has introduced an unnecessary debate in the big debate on how we make our next gains.

I'm not one who believes that at all times all Negro leaders ought to think or talk alike. Quite the opposite. We are as entitled to arguments and differences of opinion as the next man or the next race. So I'm not advocating any shutoff of the debate over tactics or strategy, or the rate of progress, or the failures. I'm just saying that introducing the cry of "black power" hasn't helped one bit. And we'll get further ahead talking in terms of human beings and human power, and human dignity and human justice than by talking in narrow race terms.

TULC has always stood for proper utilization of our power on all different fronts with proper alliances with our proven friends, and this still makes real sense to men.

First Woman Ever Selected to Serve at Top Level of Big 3

TULC's most active member has been picked to augment the UAW International Staff serving Ford employees. Mrs. Elizabeth Jackson's job promotion was announced by Ken Bannon, head of the union's Ford Department on August 29.

Mrs. Jackson's new duties encompass the supervising and negotiating of pensions and insurance benefits accruing to Ford employees.

This promotion is startling in the fact that for the first time a female production worker has been elevated by the union in the realm of dealing directly with top management of one of the Big 3 auto firms.

Celebrating 22 years at Ford's River Rouge plant, Mrs. Jackson came to Detroit via Albany, Alabama — her birthplace — and Washington, D.C. — her family move enabled her to complete her high school studies in the nation's capital.

Active in Local 600 for more than 15 years, she was named in 1964 to co-chair the international union's group seeking placement of a woman on the International Executive Board—a feat accomplished some months ago at the union's West Coast convention.

A charter member of TULC, Mrs. Jackson serves Freedom House in several capacities — the most noteworthy being that of manager. In this role she supervises waitresses, is responsible for physical improvements and coordinates activities—at times, she even organizes them!

To such an activist we offer our sincerest congratulations and best wishes on her new appointment —and trust that her new duties will not take her away from her work at Freedom House. We need you too, Liz.

Taking It on the Chin

THE GOVERNMENT has come up with some new and highly significant figures that the average factory worker is taking it on the chin financially.

A worker with three dependents has been taking home more after deductions for income and social security taxes but his paycheck is buying less. The villain is higher prices, especially for food and medical care and services generally.

In August 1965 this worker had a take-home paycheck of $95.87. A year later, in August 1966, the paycheck rose to $98.46, a gain of $2.59.

But in the same period the real purchasing power of that paycheck declined 63 cents!

During that same period, also, profits and dividend payments skyrocketed to new highs, even after adjustment for real earning power.

During this same period, also, unit labor costs have remained practically unchanged, proving conclusively that the rising cost of living does not stem from higher wages or labor costs.

This situation demands quick and specific correction. It calls for, first of all, an increase in wages and fringe benefits that will give the worker a fair share of the tremendous earnings of the companies he works for. It calls for establishing a formula that will not see wage gains wiped out by price increases that have little if any relationship to higher wage costs.

The essentials of the nation's economy call for a strong and constant purchasing power, and the great bulk of American purchasing power is in the hands of people who work for wages and salaries. A stable, expanding economy demands an end to the drainage of the worker's purchasing power and recognition of his right to a fair share of the wealth he helps produce.

COPE's Home Stretch

THE 1966 ELECTION campaign is in the home stretch, in the final five weeks. The primaries are over, the candidates selected and the issues are coming into focus.

Across the nation COPE committees have made or are in the process of making endorsements in the senatorial, gubernatorial, and congressional contests, and in many states and cities local COPE groups are backing candidates for the state legislatures, city councils and other local offices.

Those candidates endorsed by COPE have been selected because of their liberal and progressive records and views. They represent the best hope for progress at the national, state and local levels.

That means working in the neighborhoods, the precincts and the wards to inform all trade union members and voters generally of the issues involved and of the critical need to get out and vote on election day.

It means, also, voluntary contributions to help finance the campaigns of COPE-endorsed candidates. A few extra dollars can make the difference—a little more radio time, television spots, mailings. Now, in the final five weeks, is the time to make sure that the best possible job is being done.

Civil Rights, Labor Coalition Vital to Racial Peace—Randolph

The following is excerpted from an address by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph to the 13th constitutional convention of the Steelworkers in Atlantic City.

WE HAVE in the country at this time growing tension between the black people and white people.

There is what is known as the growing white backlash and there is also a growing black backlash. What will this amount to? If it continues there will be a confrontation of blacks and whites in America, not from the point of intellectual dialogue but from the point of view of a struggle, one to secure its full citizenship rights, and others to deny him the right to get these rights.

I am greatly concerned about this condition. I looked upon the faces of white citizens on the television when Negroes were marching in Chicago for the right of open occupancy in housing, and the faces were ugly with rage and resentment. This was an unhappy thing.

And then, of course, Negroes were throwing bottles and bricks, Molotov cocktails, turning over automobiles, throwing rocks into stores, looting the stores, engaging in lawlessness and so forth. I deplore lawlessness of any kind. I deplore riots of any kind. Throwing Molotov cocktails is not the answer to the problem of the Negro. The answer is deeper than that.

And consequently, civil rights leaders are greatly concerned about this trend. I want to see the civil rights leaders take great care against overheating the ghettos that have the racial and social chemistry full of ingredients of explosive potentialities. This could escalate into a race war which could become catastrophic to the Negro and to America.

Therefore, I plead with you as workers to help us resolve this problem. You know what it is to be deprived of your rights. In the middle of the 19th century the workers did not have the right to form a union of their own. There was what is known as the law of conspiracy, and if three or more workers were found together, they were penalized. Nevertheless, you fought against that, and in the latter part of the 19th century the great strikes of America took place—the railroad strike of 1894 under Eugene Victor Debs.

Railroad strikes resulted in tearing up the rails and burning down the terminals because the workers thought they had rights that were being deprived them. And, of course, you recall the Haymarket riot in Chicago in 1886; the Homestead massacre around the 90's; the Ludlow massacre. In other words, there have been battlefields all over this nation where the workers have been fighting for their rights.

Therefore the Negro workers have a right to come to you, to call upon you to help in winning their fundamental rights that are God-given and not man made.

We have developed a program, and I believe that the time has come when the street marches and demonstrations have about run their course. I believe that the strategy now in order is to shift from the streets to the conference room for the purpose of discussion of the problems in the interests of finding an answer.

WE KNOW that the public has lost some of its sympathy for the cause of civil rights because of demonstrations and disorders in the street.

You have heard a lot about black power. Well, the civil rights organizations are not committed to black power. That is a slogan and you cannot solve basic social and economic problems with slogans. It is based upon the assumption of salvation through racial isolation, which is absolutely unsound.

However, it has been created by oppression of Negroes in this country. It didn't just come out of the air. It came out of frustration, a sense of despair and hopelessness. Negroes are grabbing at every straw they think might help in the bringing out of emancipation. Instead of separation we need cooperation. That is why we have proposed a freedom budget, which is based upon the alliance between labor and the civil rights movement. This alliance will go farther and build what is known as a coalition.

In other words, we are attempting to transform the civil rights revolution into a social revolution which is concerned not only about the Negro, but about the poor whites as well.

We realize that there are 35 million people, according to the Dept. of Labor, on the poverty line in this country. Twenty percent of them are black and about 75 percent are white. Therefore, the black working poor and the white working poor must unite in order that we might be able to create full employment under the leadership of organized labor. There is no remedy for the problem that confronts the civil rights revolution without full employment. Full employment is the basis of fair employment.

The Racist Smokescreen

The national leadership of the Republican Party, seemingly desperate for an issue to rebuild the party's strength in the November elections, is trying to latch onto the white backlash issue.

The Republican Coordinating Committee, which includes the party's top leaders in Congress, the states and the national committee, issued a statement this week charging that high officials of the Johnson Administration "have condoned and encouraged disregard for law and order," and that the Administration "has accomplished nothing of substance to date to promote public safety."

The New York Times headlined the story on Page One: "GOP Will Press Racial Disorders as Election Issue." The story noted that the Republicans found the race issue of "increasing concern to Americans," and that they "moved to give the issue more prominence in the current political races."

The GOP move, tied reportedly to current polls showing the civil rights issue a major concern of 58 percent of persons queried, was too much for New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller. He immediately dissociated himself from the policy statement and said responsibility for rioting where it

He immediately dissociated himself from the policy statement and said responsibility for rioting where it took place rested with the mayors of the cities involved. Rockefeller made it clear that he did not think either Pres. Johnson or Vice Pres. Humphrey was responsible for the incidents of the past summer.

The GOP attempt to pick up votes via the white backlash route is a contemptible piece of political opportunism. That a major American political party would knowingly align itself with forces based on fear and hate is in itself repugnant.

The Coordinating Committee's position is pointed up also by the gallant fight waged by the handful of Republican liberals in the Senate against watering down administrative guidelines on integration in federal medicare and school aid programs.

These same liberals—and their Democratic liberal allies—have fought also for programs that would bring some measure of aid to the Negro ghettos via anti-poverty programs, increased and broadened minimum wage laws, school aid and a number of social welfare approaches.

Those who have milked the issue of racial conflict for votes in both the Democratic and Republican parties essentially lack any sense of decency or morality. But beyond this they stand guilty of throwing up a polluted smokescreen to cover their complete lack of program, or, in a number of cases, their extremist positions against progress in economic, politicaly or social terms.

There are critical issues in the 1966 elections and one of them is to devise ways and means, legislatively and administratvely, to reach the goal of equal rights for all.

There is the real issue of rebuilding the cities and the role of the federal government in this effort. There is the continuing war on poverty which affects three times as many whites as Negroes.

These are the issues to which the candidates should be addressing themselves at all levels in the North and the South. The blatant appeal to fear and hate and emotionalism may produce a few votes, but it will do so at the cost of seriously weakening the fabric of American society.

WASHINGTON — North Carolina Congressman L. H. Fountain feels good all over.

The Second District Democrat saved the Government a minimum of two million dollars by making a speech.

It was one of those "Horatio at the bridge" actions which mark the waning days of a congressional session when eagle eyes are required to catch the loopholes payoffs, and little favors for friends which crop into the outpouring of last minute legislation.

In Fountain's case, it was a question of longtime watchfulness. As chairman of a House subcommittee on intergovernmental relations Fountain has developed a nose for loopholes in legislation. His discoveries of hanky-panky in the federal bureaucracy have made periodic headlines.

This time his eye caught a provision buried in the Senate version of the annual appropriations bill for the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

The provision, in effect, would have allowed several research organizations with federal contracts to keep some overpayments which the Public Health Service was moving to collect.

In at least one case, a New York organization had already been billed for a $412,000 overpayment, which it would have been allowed to keep under the provision in the money bill.

Since 1958, the service has recalled over a million dollars in such overpayments.

Fountain's subcommittee staff estimated there is at least that much more to be recalled.

To head off the Senate's provision Fountain's staff whipped together a floor speech loaded with statistics on the cost recovery program.

Fountain went to the floor under a special dispensation and interrupted debate on the antipoverty bill to raise his red flag about the Senate bill.

His attack got attention in morning newspapers here, and by the time the Senate met for business that day, some senators were on to the provision.

That afternoon the sponsor of the money bill—Sen. Lister Hill of Alabama—discretely retreated. He offered a motion to excise the forgiveness provision.

NEWS from the AFL-CIO

NA. 8-3870

October 14, 1966

Following is the text of a letter sent today by AFL-CIO President George Meany to A. Philip Randolph, vice president of the AFL-CIO:

It was with warmth and enthusiasm that I read the advertisement in the New York Times this morning, signed by yourself and your fellow leaders of the Civil Rights movement.

Please extend to each of them my warm thanks and congratulations for they have in this restatement of principles and commitments summed up, in admirable fashion, the problems, the aspirations, the needs of America in this crucial moment in history.

I know that you need no reassurance of the AFL-CIO's intentions but I would appreciate it if you would convey to your colleagues the AFL-CIO's firm and unswerving determination to achieve full equality in America in all fields -- education, employment, accommodations, housing and justice.

Your restatement of commitment to the attainment of racial justice by the democratic process, your repudiation of the strategies of violence, reprisals or vigilantism, your reaffirmation of the goals of integration commends itself to every thinking American.

There is, in America today, a so-called "white backlash." It is deplorable. It was born out of the ability of demagogues to capitalize upon rioting. It stems from unreasoning fear stimulated by the reckless cries of "black power."

It thrives on the ignorance of many citizens as to the real issues involved in equal rights controversies.

You and I agree that extremism is the antithesis of democracy and extremism by advocates of justice for America's minority population cannot be countenanced any more than extremism by advocates of white supremacy. In my book, the advocates of black supremacy and white supremacy belong in the same camp and the American trade union movement opposes both equally.

I know we are also in agreement that the problems faced by the civil rights movement cannot be resolved in an economic vacuum. As the AFL-CIO has repeatedly said, equal opportunity in employment is meaningless unless there is full opportunity; equal housing is impossible until we eliminate the slums and build the homes America needs for all its population -- black or white; equal education is impossible until America puts its money where its mouth is and builds the kind of schools and supplies them with enough well-paid teachers to do the job of providing good education for every one of our children.

The AFL-CIO is dedicated to building the kind of America which will supply the answers to all of these problems. Our goal is to provide the schools, provide the jobs, provide the homes, provide the health care and provide the understanding that it is poverty and ignorance and despair that are the real root causes of all of America's domestic problems.

The AFL-CIO will not retreat from its commitment to the cause of civil rights any more than it would retreat from its commitment to abolish poverty, illness, suffering, and want in this nation.

You and I agree, I know, that a vital first step to the achievement of our goal must be a massive turnout of every registered voter on November 8, voting for those who back our program, voting in opposition to those who would delay or destroy it. We know both the friends and the enemies of the civil rights movement and of the labor movement in the Congress of the United States.

In the crucial elections of 1966, it behooves both the civil rights movement and the labor movement to support our friends and defeat our enemies. Those who counsel a boycott of the polls this year are either deliberately or mistakenly aiding only the enemies of both civil rights and the labor movements, and are playing into the hands of the demagogues who would use the white backlash to halt social progress in America.

No one could honestly pretend that the road to the achievement of full civil rights for all will be an easy one but it is a road America must traverse for it leads to a goal we must achieve.

In the achievement of that goal, the labor movement marches side by side with the leaders of the civil rights movement, like yourself, who joined in today's restatement of the policies and commitments of the civil rights movement.

Let me reiterate the AFL-CIO's position: We reject out of hand the concept that there can be any first-class or second-class citizenship in the United States. In our country there can be only one class -- citizen -- the highest and most meaningful title in a democracy.

Alliance Formed For Write In Vote Drive

An alliance that includes organized labor, religious and civil rights groups, formally organized last Tuesday, in Atlanta, Georgia agreed to a "write in Arnall" campaign.

The organization represents 50 organized groups claiming a membership of 100,000 thousand registered voters.

Mr. Arnall has stated that he will neither endorse nor oppose the write in effort but a spokesman for the alliance stated that it made no difference whether or not Mr. Arnall was behind the movement.

Mr. Joseph Jacobs, publicity chairman for the alliance said "We want a man for governor of our great State who will represent all Georgia citizens with dignity and decency and not another ax handle Wallace or Goldwater." He added that the alliance would tell each member how to write in Arnall's name on the ballot.

Jacobs said that the alliance for Social Economics Progress includes all of the states A F L-C I O Unions, the Teamsters Union, The Leadership Conference, and the Georgia Voters League.

Governor Arnall should have. He is launching an attack on Mr. Maddox irresponsibility and the ole line repudiated politicians with whom he is surrounding himself. Bo' is also making a definite pitch for the moderate democratic votes by praising the moderate administrations of Ernie' Vandiver and Carl Sanders and promising to continue their honesty in government administration.

'BACKLASH' OF HATE raged in Chicago and Cicero, Ill., recently against fair-housing demonstrators. Egged on by adults, youngsters hurled rocks, bottles and curses at demonstrators. Extremists plan to exploit so-called "backlash" to political advantage.

Hate-Peddlers at Work

CAN YOU talk about race . . . without losing your temper? Try. It's not easy.

Because there are people busy stirring up trouble. They deliberately anger you. They plan it that way.

The extremists, the professional hate-peddlers and racists—they're all trying to blind you to the real issues of the 1966 political campaign.

Hate is not the real issue. Neither is prejudice or property or who lives in your neighborhood.

The real issue is progress.

Do we move ahead on education, medicare, jobs, social security and the whole important roster of social needs? Do we really attack the key problems of tax reform, consumer protection, automation and efficient public transportation?

Or do we simply forsake progress and cave in to the hate peddlers?

IT'S NOT EASY to hear the voice of reason when unreasonable people are shouting hate in your ears. They pistol-whip you constantly about the race issue. They want you to focus your total attention on the race issue. Their plot is to persuade you to desert your real friends and vote their way.

Hate is their stock in trade. Hate is sand in your eyes.

If your Congressman or Senator voted for civil rights legislation, he's a target of the far right. They'll blame him for riots, civil disobedience and all the other social problems caused by generations of discrimination.

The hate-mongers ignore completely what your trade union emphasizes most: The 89th Congress is probably the best Congress since the critical Roosevelt days of 1933. This Congress has passed more legislation for the good of more people than any Congress in history.

Look at the record of accomplishment:

Medicare—helping 20 million elderly Americans meet their health needs.

Aid to education—helping your children and 40 million other American kids get the best possible education.

Aid to colleges—opening the doors wide to all young people who qualify, regardless of ability to pay.

Pollution control—giving us a start toward clear air and clean water, both polluted by years of neglect.

Minimum wage—raising millions of Americans to where they can sustain themselves for the first time in their lives.

And many more sound, solid, progressive pieces of legislation.

THE HATE-PEDDLERS figure they can't lose. They think you're a patsy for their propaganda and a pushover for their plans to undermine progress and democracy.

They're using race to divide and conquer.

They're throwing the sand of hate into your eyes to obscure your vision and give them the chance to get rid of medicare, scuttle education programs, wreck job-creating legislation, beat down the minimum wage and stop dead in their tracks efforts to protect the consumer and reform our antiquated tax laws.

There's nothing new about the technique.

They tried it 30 years ago in Germany. And it worked.

The choice is up to you: hate or progress. You have only one choice. —AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education

RWDSU Leader Speaks to Alabama Unionists

MOBILE, Ala.—Urging 500 delegates to the Alabama Labor Council convention to spark a large-scale organizing campaign, Int'l Pres. Max Greenberg cited RWDSU success in organizing in remote areas of the South, and declared "it can be done."

A guest speaker at the state body's three-day convention Oct. 10, 11 and 12, Greenberg's appearance was hailed by Council Pres. Barney Weeks as a tribute to the RWDSU's success in organizing in Alabama. During the past 18 months, the union has organized thousands of workers in the state, many of them in the Black Belt.

"Our International has been making real progress recently," Greenberg said, "and we are proud of it because of the area in which the organizing is taking place—the hard core, the Black Belt, the forbidden territory in Alabama, the closed door, the place with the big sign on it: Union organizers enter at your own peril. But we have entered, and we have brought the benefits of a union to thousands of workers who need them so badly."

He called for widespread organization of both Negro and white workers in the South.

"We in the RWDSU have been successful in organizing the unorganized in this state because we have organized Negro workers as well as white workers," he said. "We have made our appeal to their economic needs, to their desire for a better life, to their hopes for better opportunities for themselves and their children, and they have recognized that the only way they can achieve these things is through organization into a trade union.

"During the last few months, we have been hearing a lot about 'black power' and we have been hearing about the white blacklash and white power," he continued.

"I say to you that what is needed is neither 'black power' nor white power. We need only one power—union power."

Natural Alliance Pressed as Key To Social, Economic Reforms

The labor and civil rights movements should strengthen their natural alliance in pursuit of social and economic programs that will benefit all Americans.

This was the basic argument put forward by contributors to the November issue of the AFL-CIO Federationist. The theme of the 32-page edition was "Equal Rights: To Realize the Promise."

The unemployed and lower-income Negroes and whites all would benefit as unions and civil rights groups united to fight for full employment, adequate training and more and better schools and housing, the writers agreed.

Professor Ray Marshall of the University of Texas declared that if the labor and civil rights movements united behind common objectives, they could become a powerful force for the national good. Divided, he warned, they would strengthen their common adversaries.

Bayard Rustin, a leading civil rights strategist, wrote that the civil rights movement is at a crossroads. He said the movement must ally itself with labor and liberals to fight for the Freedom Budget or else be led by the appeal of "black power" into strife and a racial nightmare.

Other articles in the magazine dealt with the moral basis of civil rights, the roles of organized labor and civil rights groups in expanding opportunities and making civil rights laws work more effectively.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in an editorial on "Labor's Commitment" stated labor's position:

"The AFL-CIO is firmly determined to achieve full equality in America in all fields—education, employment, accommodations, housing and justice."

Meany also deplored the so-called white backlash. He blamed it on demagogues exploiting unreasoning fear stimulated by cries of "black power." He said labor opposes both black supremacy and white supremacy and believes America has only one class—citizen—"the highest and most meaningful title in a democracy."

These were the main points made by the authors:

- A. Philip Randolph, discussing "The Moral Basis of Civil Rights," makes the point that all men are brothers and so entitled to equal treatment.

Randolph, president of the Sleeping Car Porters and an AFL-CIO vice president, criticized "black power" as a slogan that cannot solve social and economic problems. He urged cooperation between labor and civil rights groups in support of the Freedom Budget and the goal of full employment.

- Dr. Marshall traced "The Roots of the Negro-Union Alliance." He proposed a variety of approaches through which discrimination might be reduced and opportunities expanded through cooperative action by labor and civil rights groups.
- Donald Slaiman, director of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dept., described the close working alliance between civil rights groups and labor in winning rights legislation and on labor issues. He spelled out in detail labor's policy and program for eliminating the discrimination remaining in unions.
- The Workers Defense League of New York City explained how it organized information on apprenticeship opportunities and worked closely with unions in placing Negro youths seeking to learn a trade.
- Whitney Young, Executive Director of the National Urban League, detailed the wide range of NUL programs aimed at opening the doors of opportunity to minorities.
- Rustin, who is executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, posed the choice facing God, he said, had been his campaign manager.

Back and Support Mr. Lester Maddox . . . Georgia's Next Governor

by A. D. GRAHAM

WITHOUT THE KNOWLEDGE OF MR. LESTER MADDOX.

"GOD", Mr. Maddox says, "has been his Campaign Manager."

A truer statement was never made as all the people of Georgia know by now. Won't it be wonderful Wednesday morning, November 9, 1966, when we wake up and we are able to go out to our cars to go to work and breath the fresh air around us; and know that we have a governor who's only obligation is to the people of Georgia.

Mr. Lester Maddox will be Georgia's next Governor regardless of what those big die hard Politicians, who have placed all their money on a loser, come up with in order to try and get their money back.

Mr. Maddox is for the working people. He knows what it is like to be poor. He knows what it is like to work for a living. He knows what it is like to go without things that others were able to enjoy; yet, he did not go rioting and looting to get where he is today. Mr. Maddox worked the same as you and I. We could all do the same as he has done if we have the ambition, and desire. If we are willing to make sacrifices that he has made. This is the Democratic way.

Mr. Maddox lost his job once because of two (2) Negroes. He was a Supervisor and his superiors wanted him to fire the two Negroes. Mr. Maddox refused and he lost his job because he failed to do so.

I have not heard Mr. Maddox soliciting the Negro vote, neither am I. I could care less as to how they vote although I feel confident they will be treated as individuals the same as you and I. That is, to say if you are worthy of consideration you will be able to obtain it regardless of race, color, creed or national orgin.

The only thing I wish to get across is that this prejudice and hate that the Atlanta Constitution and The Television Stations are trying to instill in the minds of Georgian's and the rest of the nation are False.

I say to all Georgians who have closed their eyes because of this hate; Open your eyes and read between the lines and you will see what a mistake you have made.

At first I felt the same as a lot of Georgian's, but since the Primary, "Thank God," I have opened my eyes and what did I find?

I found a man of Honor, a Man of Sincerity, a Man that is Honest, one that we can all be proud to have as our next Governor. That being none other than Lester Maddox.

Mr. Callaway has spoke as to his reasons for voting against the wage and hour bill. There are several reasons, one being that of bring Industry into the State of Georgia.

Mr. Callaway is a handsome, very distinguished, well educated and definitely has the experience in Government, but I say to Mr. Callaway we are not interested in bringing Industry into the State of Georgia on the philosophy of Cheap Labor.

I feel confident that we can bring Industry into the State of Georgia, but they, Industry, must be sold on the people of Georgia. They must be sold on our ability to produce a quality product. They, Industry, must be sold on the fact that Georgian's are not afraid of work, but are desirous of a fair wage for our Labor.

It has been proven at Lockheed Aircraft Corporation, Marietta, Ga.; as well as other corporations through out the state that the people of Georgia can build a quality product.

As you all know Mr. Callaway inherited his fortunes. This fortune was made by Georgian's at the Callaway Cotton Mills with Cheap Labor.

If you have ever worked in a cotton mill you will know what it is like. You do not know what work is like until you have.

I am not saying that these people are not happy for the majority of them are; for a rule if you work for what you get you enjoy it a lot more than if it is given to you.

I have heard rumors where the employees of Callaway Mills have been told that before they would have a Union, they would close the mills. This could only be in my opinion that they have no intention of paying a decent wage and greedy as they are not satisfied with a reasonable profit.

I say to all Georgian's whether you are for Mr. Maddox right now or whether you are Mr. Callaway; or you may be one of the disgruntled loser's who are planning a write-in campaign. Open your eyes and you will be glad you did.

Mr. Lester Maddox will be our next Governor, but we cannot afford to let up for one minute, because over-confidence has lost a lot of ballgames; it has also lost a lot of Political Races, too. If you do not believe it, ask Mr. Ellis Arnall.

The "Lord" has been mighty good to the people of Georgia so far. Mr. Maddox only obligation as of now is only to "God and the People of Georgia."

Lets keep it that way by opening up our hearts and our pocketbooks and make contributions to support him in his Campaign.

Designate some-one in your department or your group with honesty and integrity to accept your contributions. Send name, address and where you work with the amount of contribution regardless of how large or small so long as it is from your heart and not one of a selfish interest.

TO YOUNG PEOPLE'S HEADQUARTERS

Marietta, Georgia 30060

or phone 435-0202 and either Mr. Carl Couey or myself will be glad to pick it up. Or you can send it directly to the Atlanta Headquarter's:

Henry Grady Hotel
Maddox Headquarters
Peachtree Street, N.E.
Atlanta, Georgia 30303

This letter has been written by Austin D. Graham not as an act of selfishness or for personal Gain. My only desire is for all Georgia to be able to have a Governor free from the big politicians and the money men, with his only obligation being to "God and his Country". Mr. Lester Maddox is this man. He will be our next Governor. Let's all work for a greater and brighter tomorrow.

I am a Union Member and proud of it, but this is not a Union endorsement, this is a peoples' endorsement. You and I the working people of Georgia.

VOTE LESTER MADDOX — NOV. 8, 1966

Fraternally yours,
AUSTIN D. GRAHAM
Shop Steward 72-57

P.S. Already Mr. Lester Maddox has done more for Georgia than most Governors do in four years in office.

He has exposed Mayor Ivan Allen, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., Congressman Charles Weltner, and State Senator Leroy Johnson.

They have indicated that they might go fishing. I have a boat that I would like to lend them for the occasion. I haven't used it in years myself because it is a little rotten.

My only request is that they take "Big Daddy", Ralph McGill with them.

I will be glad to have some one to look after the boat where as we will be able to retrieve it from the bottom of the lake.

The boat would sure make a nice memorial for the occasion in memory of these fine Gentlemen.

"THERE IS NO SUBSTITUTE FOR THE TRUTH."

We, the Citizens of Georgia may be deplorable and ignorant, but let's show Mayor Ivan Allen, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. and Congressman Charles Weltner that we are not "Stupid" by voting Mr. Lester Maddox on November 8.

Mr. Humphrey

Humphrey to huddle with MNPL planners

Vice President Hubert Humphrey will headline an all-star speakers' bill when the Machinists Non-Partisan Political League's National Planning Committee meets in Washington, D.C. next week.

Roy Siemiller, MNPL national chairman, announced that the Vice President will be the breakfast speaker on the final morning of the five-day session. In addition, Mr. Siemiller reported these other highlights of the program:

High officials of the national committees of both political parties will speak. These include John Bailey, Democratic national chairman, and A. B. Hermann, special assistant to Ray Bliss, national GOP chairman.

Congressional leaders

A galaxy of Congressional leaders will address the group. These include U.S. Sen. Gaylord Nelson of Wisconsin, a member of the Senate Labor Committee. He will discuss labor legislation expected in the Senate.

The new House Labor Chairman, U.S. Rep. Carl Perkins, will deal with the House half of the same topic. So will U.S. Rep. Frank Thompson of New Jersey, chairman of the liberal Democratic Study Group who also heads the Special Labor Subcommittee dealing with labor law. Andrew J. Biemiller, AFL-CIO legislative director, will also speak.

Phillip A. Stern, author of the recent book, The Great Treasury Raid, will discuss loopholes in tax laws benefiting the wealthy, the subject of his book. (See Page 1).

Alexander Barkan, national director of the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education, will head a COPE panel analyzing the last election and plans for the next.

Two good friends of labor, U.S. Rep. James Corman of California and former Rep. John Gilligan of Ohio will detail what happened to them in November. Corman won and Gilligan lost, narrowly.

MNPL Co-Chairman Matthew DeMore will discuss the MNPL's program for retired union members. He will also lead a panel discussion on how to interest every member of union families—young and old—in political questions.

Panelists will include Esther Murray, COPE women's activities director; James C. O'Brien, of the National Council of Senior Citizens; and Spencer Oliver, national vice chairman of the Young Democrats.

Another panel session will discuss methods of strengthening ties with allies having interests parallel to labor. Representatives of farm, social welfare and minority group organizations will speak.

The 57 Planning Committee members will go over MNPL goals with members of the IAM Executive Council at a Thursday luncheon session, prior to submitting recommendations Friday.

A reception for Senators and Congressmen from Planning Committee members' home states will also be held.

Reports on MNPL

MNPL Co-Chairman Ross Mathews will keynote the Monday opening session. W. G. Flinn, MNPL secretary-treasurer, will report on the MNPL's 1966 Campaign Fund drive, best in the League's 20-year history. Vernon Jirikowic, MNPL vice chairman, has been named presiding officer for the conference assisted by Don Ellinger, national director.

Two Planning Committee members named since THE MACHINIST announced appointments two weeks ago include James Iafelice, president of IAM District 54, Cleveland, Ohio, and Robert H. McClure, president of IAM Lodge 1590, Rutland, Vt. Grand Lodge Rep. Robert Brown will represent IAM Vice President Floyd Smith of Cleveland instead of Grand Lodge Rep. Tom Ducy, as previously reported.

Chemical Union Breaks Discrimination Barrier

Clarksdale, Miss.—The Chemical Workers broke the racial discrimination barrier in a first contract with the Planters Mfg. Co., a cottonseed oil firm whose predominantly Negro work force voted for union representation nearly three years ago.

In the course of the successful, uphill fight for equal job rights, the Chemical Workers established the precedent that a union—as well as aggrieved workers—can bring a complaint under the Civil Rights Act. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission first said a union couldn't be a complaining party, then reversed its ruling after the Chemical Workers initiated a federal court suit against the company.

Judge Claude S. Clayton of the U.S. District Court for Northern Mississippi upheld the union's complaint of illegal race discrimination at the Mississippi plant and ordered the company to bargain with the union to remedy the conditions.

After the company complied, the judge ruled that the contract negotiated with the Chemical Workers

"remedied" the discriminatory conditions which violated the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

The new three-year agreement, approved by Judge Clayton as meeting the terms of his order, incorporates the no-discrimination provisions of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act.

Jobs Upgraded

It also provides job upgradings and non-discriminatory seniority provisions including preference for present employes over new hires for any job within the plant.

At the time the ICWU won bargaining rights, none of the 95 Negro workers earned as much as any of the 20 white workers, and only five were paid above the federal minimum wage.

Under the new agreement, more than half the Negro workers are moved to higher pay grades and seven will be advanced to pay parity with white workers.

The union's civil rights complaint charged that Negro workers received only four days of vacation a year, contrasted with two weeks for white workers. The new agreement sets a uniform standard of two weeks vacation after four years, with one week for lesser service.

Pay Grades Established

A system of 10 labor grades was negotiated by the union, resulting in the large-scale upgradings.

The ICWU said that before the agreement differentials for skilled or semi-skilled jobs performed by Negroes were no more than 5 cents an hour over the base rate. Under the new agreement, differentials up to 23 cents an hour are provided.

Periodic pay raises are provided through the life of the contract and the ICWU put a 50-cents-an-hour price tag on the value of the contract.

ICWU Pres. Walter L. Mitchell noted that the case overturned a pattern of discrimination in which jobs were divided into "white" and "Negro" categories and Negroes were paid at a lower rate than the skills would justify.

ATLANTA PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Atlanta, Georgia

TO: Atlanta Local School Blue Ribbon Entries in the Atlanta Regional Social Science Fair

FROM: Social Science Fair Committee

We congratulate you on developing a blue ribbon social science project.

You will want to know the procedure for setting up your project and for removing it. Please follow these directions very carefully.

1. Projects must be set up at the Atlanta Instructional Services Building, 2930 Forrest Hill Drive, S.W., on Friday, March 3, between 12:30 p.m. and 8:00 p.m. Please do not come at any other time.

2. Please bring your own card table. We cannot provide tables.

3. No project may be removed from the Fair until after visiting hours on Sunday and will have to be removed by noon on Monday, March 6.

4. Report to registration desk in lobby, register your project, receive your space assignment and locate your space before bringing your project into the building. If you follow this procedure, you will not risk damaging your project in the crowded lobby.

The Atlanta Schools and the Social Science Fair Committee are not responsible for equipment or damages. There will be personnel serving as hosts when the building is open to the public.

The procedure for blue ribbon projects to be entered into the State Fair, March 15, 16, and 17 at Georgia State College is as follows:

1. The Fair Committee will fill out and file with the State Committee the duplicate State Fair entry blanks for the possible 18 Regional blue ribbon projects and the research paper in Group III.

2. These project winners will be notified by the State Committee as to time, place, etc.

3. Your project may be improved between the Regional and the State Fair.

If you have questions, please call Mrs. Moon's office, 761-5411, ext. 236. There will be someone available Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday to answer them.

UAW WASHINGTON REPORT

printed every Friday in Washington, D. C.

Vol. 7, No. 10 — March 6, 1967

United Automobile, Aerospace, and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, UAW, AFL-CIO

War on poverty lets poor help themselves and trains them to help their neighbors. They often make better social workers than professionals—because they know slum problems from bitter, first-hand experience.

War on poverty is more efficient than space program

The war on poverty is a lot more successful and efficient than our space program. That's what many observers across America are saying, as the poverty program moves into its third year of operation.

"It cost taxpayers tens of billions and took a decade of failures just to get an unmanned space capsule off the ground," says one poverty field general, "and they're still maybe five years from the moon.

"But we get blamed for not being able to wipe out every last trace of poverty, crime and unhappiness in a year or two—with less than a third of the space budget to work with.

"Just a few weeks ago, I was out talking to a PTA group," he went on, "explaining to them how our program works. After I finished talking, I asked for questions. One man said, 'Look, why don't you stop monkeying around with all this fancy give-away stuff and just start training people and finding them jobs?'

"I guess most people still don't know that we're not a welfare agency. We don't give away one red cent. The poverty program does exactly what that man thought it should, and a lot more besides. But you can just spread our budget so far."

One of the biggest boosts the program has gotten came through an amendment to last year's poverty bill. Proposed by Cong. James Scheuer (D-NY), it called for a $75 million public services job program.

Sign on the door promises help in English and Spanish. New breed of case worker inside neighborhood poverty center keeps that promise.

Why hire a man who's never worked?

BRONX, NEW YORK—

Many of the residents of a Bronx slum who have been hired by a community mental health project have never gone to high school. Some have never had a job and others have lived off welfare for ten years.

But here's what project administrators have to say about their job performance: "The consensus is that the aids provide a remarkable amount of service. Most importantly, they can draw residents with problems to our center—something we could never do."

Estimates are that the center sees 6,600 new clients each year. There are an average of four persons to a family in this area of the Bronx. So, through the work of "people who've never worked", the center is able to touch the lives of more than 24,000 different lives each year.

SCHEUER

The Scheuer Amendment

NY Cong. James Scheuer's plan to employ bottom-of-the-barrel slum dwellers is now officially part of poverty law. 8000 of America's neediest will soon be helping all of us as aids in hospitals, schools, and libraries. Plan will cost $36 million this year, but will quickly pay for itself by lowering welfare costs and increasing tax revenue.

"The public services job program holds out two keys to open the double lock of poverty: a job and a productive career for every unemployed person who wishes to become independent and self-supporting; and a radical improvement in the quality of our education, health, welfare and crime prevention services."

—NY Cong. Scheuer, October 7, 1966

"Watts, Harlem, Cicero and San Francisco tell us the same story—that the stultifying effects of long-term unemployment are among the major root causes of poverty. Unemployment among Negroes is two to four times as high as among whites. Never in a generation has it been this bad. And the gap is not narrowing; the gap is growing."

"Up until now," Scheuer told the House of Representatives last fall, "the poverty program has concentrated on poor people who could learn a skill in a relatively short time. It has trained thousands of them, counseled them, given them other services they need to be employable—like medical care or legal aid—and found them jobs. This is good, of course, but we also have to do something for the tens of thousands of people who simply can't be trained overnight."

The Scheuer plan, to which Congress finally appropriated $36 million, will create public service jobs for about 8000 men and women—many of whom are now on the welfare roll. "In addition to taking them off relief, the program will help them become taxpayers and, at the same time, provide many of the extra services our cities need so desperately," the Congressman says.

Last year the National Commission on Technology, Automation and Economic Progress estimated that 5.3 million new jobs could be created through public service employment. The greatest needs were in hospitals, welfare and police departments, schools and urban renewal programs.

With a budget of only $36 million for the whole country, Scheuer's program can't hope to solve the entire unemployment problem. But it will prove once and for all what many experts have long maintained—that the poor would much rather work than live off welfare payments.

Conducted jointly by the Office of Economic Opportunity and the Labor Department, the new careers program will seek out the hard-core unemployed and place them in on-the-job training programs with a variety of public and non-profit service agencies. The federal government will pay 90 percent of their wages, with the understanding that the agency will put them on its payroll after they learn the ropes.

Opponents of the plan argued that it would cost too much and that the new careersmen's jobs would be just a waste of time. But the project's economics are sound and the jobs it creates will fill serious gaps in our present system of public services.

Suppose a new careersman goes to work as a hospital assistant at $2 an hour. He'll make $4000 a year and pay back between $600 and $800 of it in taxes—to the city, state and federal government. After he learns his job well enough, he'll go on the hospital's regular payroll and continue to pay taxes.

In about five years—perhaps less if he moves up to a better-paying job—he'll have more than paid back America's investment in him. And, instead of taking his city's welfare, he'll be contributing to it.

Not all the program's participants will move up and out of the program, of course. Some are already too handicapped by years in the slums. But one of the program's sternest rules requires that every job be in an area of severe public need.

With a critical shortage of teachers, nurses, medical technicians, policemen and social caseworkers, it won't be hard to find jobs to fit the legislative requirements, though. The new employees will handle many of the routine, efficiency-shattering duties that now harass nurses, teachers and other professionals. This will release them to spend full time doing what they were trained for.

The Teacher Corps

Important, successful part of assault on poverty, Teacher Corps gives poor kids good education — and chance to play on grass, not cement. America is willing to invest tens of billions to maybe get to the moon—but Corps has to struggle along, trying to do man-sized job with peanuts.

On some of the new jobs—especially in social work—the hard-core unemployed will actually be able to work as well as or better than trained professionals. Take the community mental health centers in the south Bronx, New York slums, for instance.

Dr. Harris Peck, operating on a demonstration grant from the National Institute of Mental Health, has been hiring the poor to help the poor for over a year now. What makes his center unique, he says, "is its non-professional personnel. Each center has from five to ten mental health aids, recruited from the surrounding neighborhood.

"Because they share the same way of life as their clients, the aids are indispensable not only to fill manpower shortages, but as crucial links between the residents and the mental health professionals.

"They interpret each to each other and, by lending a less bureaucratic tone to the centers, they help reduce the understandable reluctance of the poor to become engaged with yet another professional, establishment organization."

With crime on the rise in most of our cities and suburbs, the precious-few policemen we have shouldn't have to waste their time writing parking tickets or doing the dozens of other annoying tasks that keep them away from their beats. Use of new careersmen as clerks, to control parking, or to report abandoned cars and litter would free highly-trained officers for more valuable work.

Opening free day care centers for the children of parents who want to work or train but can't afford a baby-sitter would also create thousands of new jobs—and enable the parents to go to work as well.

The more Cong. Scheuer's plan is studied, the more sense it makes. Jobs are not the only answer to poverty, of course. But with back up services from already-going efforts like the community action program, Headstart, free medical clinics and family counseling, the new careers program will give poverty fighters the one tool they've been missing.

Taxpayers - not tax eaters

Detroit's Adult and Youth Employment program started last fall with $850,000 of war on poverty funds. It has already paid for itself by increasing tax revenues and lowering welfare costs.

1270 hard-core unemployed—many welfare longtimers—have already gone to work for private employers thanks to a hard-hitting team of job placement specialists hired by the poverty program.

The new workers will pay a total of $680,000 worth of taxes this year alone. And, by getting off welfare, they'll save Detroiters another $250,000.

WEEKEND WRAPUP

Washington has many moods these days. There are flashes of great optimism about the future, and fits of the most abject depression. The war escalates again—Sen. Bob Kennedy brilliantly pleads for an end to bombing North Vietnam, while Administration insiders passionately argue the domino theory and warn Asia will collapse if we don't stand firm. The daily gore occurs thousands of miles away, but it unnerves even the hawks. There are rumblings of a possible recession while U. S. economy booms at a slower pace. Congress bitterly bounces Adam Powell from his seat. He'll be re-elected again and again and court battles will rage for years. There's faint talk of getting an ethical code for all congressmen. Conscience-stricken Congress may finally button up loose ends of its own behavior. How goes the big problems? Poverty? Pollution? Rotting cities? Urban sprawl? What's with them? The White House sends massive, plainly-spoken messages to Congress—and there they wait for action. Congressional committees buzz with activity—but over their heads hang those billion dollar price tags for schools, cities, and clean air which blind these new breed Republicans—cocky and glib about what's wrong, with no urgent feel for forging ahead where mighty 89th Congress last year so nobly did its duty for future generations. . . . Approval of the US-Soviet consular treaty appears headed for Senate approval. It's not much, but it's a landmark and rightwingers are frantically trying to "mccarthy" Congress against it. . . . Labor movement suffers image problem among young people. This nags thoughtful people in and out of AFL-CIO ranks. Nearly half U.S. population is under 25 years of age. During past three years, 42 percent of UAW membership (549,000) came into union ranks as new members, while 250,000 old-timers retired. They don't remember Battle of Ford Overpass. The Depression and Wagner Act are ancient history. They were in swaddling clothes during World War II. They barely remember Korea. . . . Notes from huckster lane: Total US tab for advertising last year was $16 billion—that's 8 percent over 1965. That's an awful lot of bone-rattling commercials for headache pills and shaving cream. . . . Americans lost two creative philanthropists when Mr. and Mrs. Stephen Currier disappeared at sea recently. They made no big splash with their generous gifts. The millions they gave will brighten many cities and hearts for many years to come. They were young, they were rich—their impact on their country was great. . . . California's Chet Holifield is a homespun liberal. He's a respected dean of the Democratic Study Group, a liberal with long seniority who speaks his mind. Last week he exploded during a hearing on a proposed $91 million to start man to Mars: "I'm getting colder and colder to these programs even though my state gets 50 percent of space contracts and I'll probably get a lot of letters for saying it. But I'm getting just a little sick of this billion here, billion there only to satisfy intellectual curiosity. After they get to Mars they'll want to go to some other planet, whatever the hell it's called. I wish you had to go to my district every two years and try to sell them on this. Tell them they have to put up with a double school session and take Jenny to class at 6 o'clock in the morning. My people are getting a little tired of it all, too. They're up to their ears in taxes and what are they getting? We've got 190 million people out there that need hospitals and schools and other things." . . . Congress is racing to get national trails and wild rivers bills passed. Pennsylvania's Sen. Joe Clark this month begins hearings on war on poverty. There's new congressional look-see at $17 billion government spent yearly for research. Big labor rallies around U.S. major cities this month for higher Social Security benefits.

"Mr. Gardner Ackley (chairman of President's Council of Economic Advisers) is not only unrealistic, his whole attitude on the escalator clause is unworkable." . . . "He doesn't have to sit at any bargaining table. He is very fortunate in that respect. He will live a very cloistered sheltered life. But I can tell him that wage earners are not going to say 'It is too bad, we are going to have to take a 50 percent loss in our real wage position because of inflation.'" . . . "They are going to fight to make it up. That is what happened in the airline strike. The fight there was about catch-up money. And it is unrealistic to believe that wage earners are going to look at the distribution of national income and see everybody going through the stratosphere and then say they can only have 50 percent of their catch-up money for escalation." . . . "I think industry has to make up its mind. Ten years from now, what kind of workers do you think G. M. will be employing. They aren't going to be immigrants out of Ellis Island coming over here with a loaf of pumpernickel bread stuffed in their jeans. They are going to be fellows with a 2- and 3-year college education. Their whole relationship about their employer is going to be quite different. And we keep looking backward when we are talking about tomorrow. We have got to look ahead." . . . "This is why in 1967 we are going to abolish—we have made this very clear—the hourly rate system in the automobile industry. This idea of paying the worker by the tenth of the hour is an old concept that came out of the early beginning of the industrial revolution. We are going to put everybody on a salary, because the dignity and the whole relationship has got to change, and we are going to do it."—UAW President Walter Reuther before Joint Economic Committee last week.

A Hellish Trinity? Baby, It's Coming!

Atlanta Georgia Bulletin March 23, 1967

By Garry Wills

Some read the Birch publications to enjoy a liberal frisson -- anticipating masochists who feel already the jackboot heeling down on them. But I read the pamphlets I run across primarily for laughs. Mr. Welch is now, for instance, explaining why the Communists -- who want us in Vietnam so taxes (and socialism) will go up, morals (and morale) go down -- sent their "fronts" out to demonstrate against the war, thus tricking us into thinking they oppose it, making us, therefore, espouse it. That is, the Communists are using our government's anti-communism (which most of the time Mr. Welch is assuring us doesn't exist) for their own purposes, and Welch somehow dances over to the side of those liberals who say Lyndon Johnson is a murderer of American boys. It is a great routine, and Mr. Welch is fun to watch -- a kind of mental Plastic Man.

WILLS

But the March issue of the Birch magazine American Opinion is a different matter. There is a review in it which is enough to scare anyone. It is an analysis, carried through with the febrile deracinated insight some Birchers achieve, of the phenomenon of George Wallace. Wallace, we are told, is the Coming Thing, though the author is a bit unhappy at his pro-welfarism. He is willing to swallow what Birchers normally call a form of socialism, however, in order to get Wallace's patriotism and anti-communism into the White House. And to accomplish that, welfare is the key ingredient.

Where do you find patriotic nationalism, anti-communism, resentment of the Negro, and a desire for heavy welfare programs? In the rank and file of the labor unions. The author argues that other right-wingers have been unable to tap the unions' strength because they were out of sympathy with the welfare demands of today's working class. Wallace is not unsympathetic to those demands, and never has been -- and the Bircher hints that his fellows had better overcome their aversion to "the dole" if they want to climb aboard the winner's train.

The scary thing about all this is the uneasy memory that Hitler rose on the force of just such a hellish trinity -- nationalism, racism, and socialism. The author does not shrink from recognizing this fact -- he does not ever regret the comparison. After all, Hitler did rise, didn't he? And think of the gains! The author blissfully dreams of the day when Wallace will heal the national schizophrenia by "politically liquidating the Establishment." (When he saw that passage, a conservative friend of mine said, "This is what they really want -- and they'll skip the adverb"). Here is the Bircher's vision of the new goose-step: "Wallace and homo Americanus vulgaris Caucasianus versus Reuther, Rockefeller, and Martin Luther King. Talk about realignment! Baby, it's coming!"

Frightening isn't it? If the shrewd imperturbable Wallace can extend his tentacles out from the South through the labor unions, if Bircher kooks can forget their ideological purity and start plotting the compromises necessary for a takeover, if the working man's patriotism and anti-communsim can be mixed with the poison of racism, it could happen here. The trains could be made to run on time -- and the kilns.

WRITE-IN, GEORGIA
5 Forsyth Street, N. W.
Atlanta, Georgia 30303

Dear fellow Georgian: April 8, 1967

The general election last fall produced one of the greatest "grass-roots" protest votes in the entire history of Georgia State politics - or, for that matter, in the entire United States. Well over 100,000 Georgians, in the face of enormous obstacles, declared they wanted neither the "lesser" evil, nor the other one. Little has happened since November to challenge the validity of the "Write-In, Georgia" movement.

Since November, it has become increasingly clear that the large write-in vote was not a one-shot, flash-in-the-pan phenomenon. From all over the state, inquiries have flowed in about what can be done to translate the write-in movement into a viable, year-round force in Georgia Democratic Party affairs.

The Executive Committee of Write-In, Georgia has held a number of in-depth discussions on this topic and suggests the following plan of action:

1. A state-wide rally will be held on Saturday, May 13, at 8:00 p.m., the Biltmore Hotel, Atlanta, Georgia.

2. The purpose of this rally will be:
   a) to record the contribution to good government made by Write-In, Georgia, to settle up the financial and other business affairs of Write-In, Georgia, and pay tribute to the thousands of citizens who made up Write-In, Georgia, and

   b) to make plans for an on-going state organization of moderate, loyal Democrats interested in progressive government, tentatively being called the Georgia Democratic Party Forum.

This will be an opportunity to meet again your fellow Georgians who worked with you in Write-In, Georgia. It will also provide you with the unique challenge to help build a moderate and progressive voice within the Georgia Democratic Party.

You can help specifically by doing the following:

1. Hold meetings with those active last fall to make sure you have a good delegation for the 13th.

2. Elect at least 2 representatives to come to a planning luncheon at 1:00 p.m., on May 13 at the Biltmore. Please send the names of those elected to us as soon as possible.

3. Read and discuss the memorandum on the back of this letter, which spells out the main thrust of the Georgia Democratic Party Forum in greater detail.

4. Make sure that the May 13th Rally is well publicized in your community.

5. Duplicate this letter, and any other notice of the Rally you may wish to draw up, and get it into the hands of as many people and organizations as possible.

6. Get the May 13th Rally announced in your local papers, and on radio and TV.

We look forward to being with you on May 13th at this historic Rally.

Yours for Good Government,

/sjs

The Executive Committee

M E M O R A N D U M April 8, 1967

In order to provide moderate, loyal, Georgia Democrats with an opportunity to be politically active within the Democratic Party, it is proposed that a state-wide organization called the Georgia Democratic Party Forum be set up along the following lines:

1. A statement of organizational principle should be drafted which clearly identifies the Forum with the National Democratic Party and the high ideals of such leaders as Franklin D. Roosevelt, Harry S. Truman, Adlai Stevenson, John F. Kennedy, and Lyndon B. Johnson.

2. This statement of principle, together with a call to a state-wide organizational conference, should be sent throughout the State and endorsement received from as many local political leaders as possible.

3. Purpose of this state-wide conference would be three-fold, a) to draft a State Democratic Party Forum program stated in terms of Georgia's needs and problems, b) to organize the Forum structure on a district-by-district basis and elect a State Steering Committee, c) to encourage individuals to take an active part in Georgia Democratic Party affairs, and to be paid members where such paid membership is available (as, for instance, in the Fulton County Democratic Party).

4. A drive be initiated for a budget sufficient to open a State office with staff.

5. That district, county, and state machinery be carefully established (for example, care be taken that delegations be fully bi-racial), so that we will be ready to work actively on behalf of the National Democratic Ticket in 1968.

6. That local and district units be encouraged to serious year-round study, research, promotion of policies, legislative activity, and action projects in keeping with our State Program.

7. That local and district units engage in year-round voter registration, education, and recruitment.

Dear Friend:

Enclosed is a copy of the President's message concerning the 1967 Civil Rights Act as reproduced in pamphlet style by the NAACP. I think you will find this message both informative and useful.

The two newspaper articles are included for your information. It is noteworthy that the Clay story appeared on the front page of the Sunday edition of the paper. The report of the Flowers speech took a back page a couple weeks later. It happens all too often!

If you would like additional copies of any of these articles, we have them on a limited basis.

With good wishes.

Flowers Criticizes Carmichael, King In Howard Speech

By Paul W. Valentine
Washington Post Staff Writer

Richmond M. Flowers, Alabama's former attorney general, told a Howard University crowd yesterday that Stokely Carmichael has betrayed Negro interests and Martin Luther King Jr. is wrong to oppose the war in Vietnam.

The racial moderate, who lost a bid for the Alabama governorship last year to Mrs. George Wallace, received a standing ovation from the predominantly Negro gathering after a speech in which he called Carmichael's draft-card-burning exhortations "almost treasonous," compared Carmichael, a black power advocate, to George Wallace and suggested that the two men run on the same ticket for President and Vice President.

"I do see a very close parallel with such a leader defying a draft notice and the Governor of a state standing in a schoolhouse door in defiance of a Federal court order that admits a qualified citizen of that state to the state university and attempts to exclude her for the sole reason that she is a Negro," Flowers said. "Defiance is defiance whether you are defying a draft notice or a Federal court order."

He added, "I would strongly suggest that Stokely Carmichael enter himself in the vice presidential race and run on a ticket with George Wallace because through his present behavior he is doing more to aid and advance the Wallace cause than any other individual in the country."

"The ghetto Negro and the high school dropout simply cannot distinguish the fine line of difference between Black Power and Political Power," Flowers said. "All power means to him is physical force, and when his leaders advocate any kind of power he is stirred into a dangerous and destructive crowd that puts itself completely above the law."

Carmichael "has completely turned his back upon the best interest for the advancement of the black man," Flowers said, "and reverted to the typical demagogue that sacrifices everything and everybody to foster his personal aggrandizement. Black power, defiance and black supremacy are just as immoral and illegal as white power, defiance and white supremacy."

RICHMOND M. FLOWERS
. . . sees Negro betrayed

Flowers praised Dr. King for his contribution to civil rights but said he has erred in linking the rights movement with the anti-Vietnam war movement.

"There is no connection," he said, "and I fear that certain leaders have taken this attitude in order to keep themselves in the news rather than spending their energies to improve the Negroes' position in this Nation . . . Dr. King's actions today render the Southern white man of reason, who is willing to work toward better understanding, practically strengthens the hand of the racist segregationist."

800 at Howard U. Cheer Clay As He Preaches 'Black Is Best'

By Matthew Lewis—The Washington Post

Muhammad Ali — or Cassius Clay — is central attraction at Howard University.

By Hollie I. West
Washington Post Staff Writer

Heavyweight boxing champion Muhammad Ali went to Howard University yesterday and preached a black power sermon to more than 800 students who shouted a joyful approval of his pro-black statements.

"All you need to do is know yourself to set yourself free," said Ali, otherwise known as Cassius Clay.

"We don't know who we are," he said. "We call ourselves Negroes, but have you ever heard of a place called Negroland?"

Speaking under sunny skies from the steps of Douglass Hall on the University quadrangle, Ali said he wanted to show Howard students "black is best."

"Black dirt is the best dirt," he said. "Brown sugar causes fewer cavities, and the blacker the berry, the sweeter the juice."

In contrast, Ali, a Black Muslim minister, said "the white man tries to show white as all-good."

"All the good cowboys ride white horses," he said. "Angel food cake is white and devil's food cake is chocolate."

Shouts of "Tell it like it is" or "Hear the word" popped from the crowd.

The afternoon rally was a festive occasion for many. Ali's bodyguards had difficulty keeping the surging crowd back from the champion at several points.

Several students—male and female sporting Afro natural hair cuts—wore bright orange and green Agrican togas and shawls.

Some conspicuously carried copies of "The Wretched of the Earth," a call to arms for the Afro-Asian world by the late Algerian writer Frantz Fanon.

Ali asked the students to "seek out" the teachings of Elijah Muhammad, national leader of the Black Muslims.

"The honorable Mr. Muhammad is preaching the bol truth," said Ali as he waved copy of Muhammad's bool "Message to the Black Man i America."

Salesmen On Move

Nattily dressed Black Mu lims immediately set out i efforts to sell the student copies of the book and "Mu hammad Speaks," the officia Black Muslim newspaper.

Ali asked the students t tions from government head of Moslem countries.

"I am the brother of mor than 600 million followers of Allah," he said. "You are living in the last days of hell in this country."

At the end of his speech, Ali, in an off-key voice, performed a verse-song called "A White Man's Heaven is a Black Man's Hell." The recitation drew thunderous applause

A $1,000 Volunteer

In a brief question-and-answer period, William Battle, of 1444 W st. nw., volunteered to take Ali's place in the Army for $1000.

"No, brother, your life is worth more than $1000," the champion said.

A group of students intermittently chanted a slogan popularized by black power advocate Stokley Carmichael, "Hell no, we won't go!"—meaning they wouldn't go to Vietnam.

Ali, currently embroiled in Selective Service problems, is scheduled to be inducted into the military April 28 in Houston.

Yesterday, he reiterated a statement he made last Thursday in Louisville, when he said he would not enter the Army "under any circumstances."

Long Autograph Session

Ali autographed copies of the Muslim newspaper for an hour and 15 minutes after his speech.

"I must have signed more than 850 papers," he said later.

When a crowd of students pressed toward him on his arrival on campus, the prizefighter, carrying a stack of papers, said, "I ain't doing nothin' but selling 'Muhammad Speaks' newspaper."

This week's copy carries the headline "Justice on Trial" and shows a Negro telling an evil-looking Uncle Sam that jail is better than going to war.

Following his Howard appearance, Ali made a brief stop at 12th and U Streets.

"He Sure Is Fine"

A woman rushed out of a nearby beauty shop with her hair rolled up to meet the champ.

"He sure is fine," she exclaimed, while rubbing his hand.

"Be good now, I'm your brother," he cautioned her.

After 10 minutes of autograph signing, Ali's entourage sped to the Washington Hilton Hotel, where he is staying.

He is scheduled to tour the Lorton Youth Center this morning and deliver the regular 2 p.m. Sunday sermon at the Muslim Mosque, 1519 4th st. nw.

Dr. Nathan Hare, assistant professor of sociology at Howard, called the turnout for Ali "tremendous." He said Ali "got more student response than any other black power spokesman who's appeared at Howard."

Hare is spokesman for the Black Power Committee, sponsoring group for the rally.

No Metropolitan police were at the rally. Police authorities said six policemen of the Civil Disturbance Unit were standing by at the 13th Precient station. Two University security guards were on duty.

Labor-Civil Rights Alliance Growing in Dixie

ATLANTA, Ga. (PAI)—It's receiving few headlines but organized labor in the South, playing an active role in the civil rights movement, is helping to create a whole new group of inter-racial leaders in the states of the old Confederacy.

Much of this is being made possible by a close working relationship between the labor movement and a new group, the Scholarship, Education and Defense Fund for Racial Equality, Inc. (SEDFRE).

The executive director of SEDFRE, Marvin Rich, believes that "the newly enfranchised Negro in the South and the labor movement are natural allies."

Rich declared that the cooperation of the labor movement with SEDFRE in its leadership training program was a positive step and should help stimulate further projects at the grass roots level, particularly in the area of citizenship education.

Labor staff members such as Fannie Neal and Earl Davis of COPE, Norman Hill, Legislative Representative of the AFL-CIO's Industrial Union Department, Horace Sheffield of the United Automobile Workers, Tony Marino of the United Packinghouse Workers, and Dean Culver of the United Furniture Workers are now serving on SEDFRE leadership training faculties.

"These men are helping to develop year-round projects in citizenship education," Rich said, "and more important are aiding SEDFRE in developing issues for the community, getting out the vote and even dealing with such basics as instruction in the operating of voting machines."

Working in cooperation with labor and the Southern Regional Council of Atlanta, SEDFRE's workshops have helped Negroes:

1. To develop a practical understanding of the functions and responsibilities of city, county, and state government offices;

2. To introduce participants to the structure, policies, platforms, and personalities of American political parties;

3. To develop skill in the ways and means of effective political campaigning.

SEDFRE's executive director stressed that the organization's leadership workshops were carried out on an interracial basis and that the labor organizers were working in the same way. There are now nearly 3 million registered Negro voters in the South and some 7,500 local community civil rights groups throughout the nation with which SEDFRE and labor can work, Rich said.

Despite Past Gains, Much Work Remains

As our statement of principle and aims makes clear (see box below), the Bessemer Voters League actively seeks both to register increasing numbers of people in the community and to educate them politically. For the last 20 years, these have been its major tasks.

The Congressional passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 helps us immeasurably in this endeavor. Last year, for the first time, federal registrars were sent to our county, in accordance with one of the major provisions of the new law.

Many of the barriers on the Negro's path to the ballot box have been removed. Yet, fear and intimidation still must be overcome if we are to achieve our maximum voting strength.

Significant gains were made here in Bessemer in last year's election . . . make no mistake about that. Yet, realize, too, that much work remains to be done prior to our next general election in November, 1968. For powerful forces will again be arrayed against us—determined to strip us of recent gains, as well as to hold the line against further advances.

'Now That You're Old Enough To Vote, Suh, Ah Hope You'll Vote For Me'

First Level – The Precinct

Effective political work begins at the precinct level, where success can be experienced. The truth of that statement was clearly shown in last year's May primary election, in which four Negroes from Precinct No. 33 (now changed to No. 1) were elected to the Jefferson County Democratic Executive Committee—Atty. David H. Hood, Israel Williams, Sam Allen, and Charles Moorer.

Since being sworn in, Atty. Hood has been appointed a member of the vacancy committee and has been successful in having three more Negroes appointed to the executive committee—Willie Davis, Abraham Dale, and Herman Woods.

Throughout the county, 37 Negroes now serve on the 120-member group.

A major step toward political equality for the Negro in Jefferson County, the achievement has been paralleled in only two other of Alabama's 67 counties—Mobile and Macon—although in those counties the numbers gaining seats were far smaller.

Obviously, the struggle for political equality will be long and arduous. We must move forward step by step, while never losing sight of that ultimate objective.

Other Gains

For the first time in history in Jefferson County, four Negroes last year were in the run-off election as candidates for the State House of Representatives — Atty. Hood, Dr. James T. Montgomery, L. S. Gaillard, and Atty. Arthur Shorer. Of 54 Negro candidates for state and county office throughout Alabama in 1966, 23 received sufficient votes to be in the May 31 run-offs.

In Macon County, that run-off produced the first Negro sheriff in the state's history—Lucius Amerson. Two other Negroes there—L. A. Locklair and Harold Webb—won positions as tax collector and member of the Board of Education respectively.

Statement of Principle and Aims of the Bessemer Voters League

We acknowledge with humility the divine power of the Almighty God and implore His guidance during these critical days that He may point out to us and the people of the world the pathway to everlasting world peace and domestic tranquility, and preservation of our cherished American way of life and the fundamental principle of the government of the people, for the people, and by the people.

The Bessemer Voters League stands today where it has always stood, with feet firmly planted on the solid foundation of the Constitution of the United States. The Bessemer Voters League is non-partisan, but we reaffirm our devotion and pledge anew our allegiance to the true principles of the historic Democratic party—the party to which we have given our full support since the election of the late Franklin Delano Roosevelt, Harry Truman, the late John F. Kennedy, and President Lyndon Johnson.

Article II, Purpose and Aim, of the Bessemer Voters League Constitution: Section I. The purpose of this organization shall be to develop fellowship among qualified voters and increase the number of voters. Section II. This organization aims to stimulate and politically educate people in this area.

NEWS from the AFL-CIO

Coalition

NA. 8-3870

FOR RELEASE IN A.M. PAPERS, THURSDAY, JULY 27, 1967

AFL-CIO President George Meany today sent the following telegram to AFL-CIO Vice President A. Philip Randolph:

The sober, thought-provoking statement issued by you, Mr. Wilkins, Mr. Young and Dr. King fully merits the support of all Americans. Let me assure you it is the position of the AFL-CIO.

We will continue to push, with all the vigor at our command, for the adoption of legislation to meet the problems you outlined -- to eliminate from the American scene disease, slums, unemployment, poor educational facilities and above all else, discrimination.

As an item of first priority, America must aid the innocent victims of the rioters. Certainly they deserve, at the very least, the same help the government gives the victims of natural disasters. We urge the Congress, as an immediate matter, to amend the necessary laws to give them this assistance.

We say to the Congress: Now is not the time for the cheap humor and complete stupidity shown by those members of the House of Representatives who voted to kill the rat-control bill. Nor is now the time for a minority of the Senate Judiciary Committee to engage in a racially-inspired attack on the nomination of Thurgood Marshall to the United States Supreme Court. Now is the time for action and statesmanship by passing the poverty, housing, education and civil rights bills proposed by President Johnson and restoring full funding for the Model Cities and rent supplement bills passed last year.

My warm congratulations to you and your colleagues on a courageous, sensible statement.

FULL TEXT OF NEGRO LEADERS STATEMENT:

Developments in Newark, Detroit and other strife-torn cities make it crystal clear that the primary victims of the riots are the Negro citizens. That they have grave grievances of long standing cannot be denied or minimized. That the riots have not contributed in any substantial measure to the eradication of these just complaints is by now obvious to all.

We are confident that the overwhelming majority of the Negro community joins us in opposition to violence in the streets. Who is without the necessities of life when the neighborhood stores are destroyed and looted? Whose children are without milk because deliveries cannot be made? Who loses wages because of a breakdown in transportation or destruction of the place of employment? Who are the dead, the injured and the imprisoned? It is the Negroes who pay and pay and pay, whether or not they are individually involved in the rioting. And for what?

Killing, arson, looting are criminal acts and should be dealt with as such. Equally guilty are those who incite, provoke and call specifically for such action. There is no injustice which justifies the present destruction of the Negro community and its people.

We who have fought so long and so hard to achieve justice for all Americans have consistently opposed violence as a means of redress. Riots have proved ineffective, disruptive and highly damaging to the Negro population, to the civil rights cause, and to the entire nation.

We call upon Negro citizens throughout the nation to forego the temptation to disregard the law. This does not mean that we should submit tamely to joblessness, inadequate housing, poor schooling, insult, humiliation and attack. It does require a redoubling of efforts through legitimate means to end these wrongs and disabilities.

We appeal not only to black Americans, but also to our fellow white citizens who are not blameless. The disabilities imposed upon Negro citizens are a century old. They remain because the white citizenry in general supports these restrictions.

The 90th Congress has exhibited an incredible indifference to hardships of the ghetto dwellers. Only last week the House defeated a rat-control bill which would have enabled the cities to get rid of the rats which infest the slums.

And finally, we support President Johnson's call "upon all our people black and white alike in all our cities to join in a determined program to maintain law and order, to condemn and to combat lawlessness in all its forms, and firmly to show by word and by deed that riot, looting and public disorder will just not be tolerated."

No one benefits under mob law. Let's end it now!

LETTER FROM WASHINGTON

OCTOBER 10

PRESIDENT JOHNSON was hospitalized, as President Eisenhower was almost exactly a decade earlier, at a time when no major foreign crises existed or impended and when political life in this city was somewhat more than usually routine. With President Eisenhower, of course, this was almost wholly a matter of luck, while with President Johnson it was partly luck and partly management. As the White House tells it, he became aware of his illness on the morning of September 7th; he was at his Johnson City ranch at the time, and he was shortly advised that while surgery at an early date seemed called for, he could think in terms of weeks rather than days or hours. Had immediate hospitalization and surgery been ordered, there would have been a good deal more alarm here than there has been this past week. Indian troops were moving on Lahore, and Pakistani paratroopers were dropping on the Punjab. China seemed likely to join the war. U Thant's mission to the belligerents was then only a plan—and not a very promising one. President Sukarno seemed about to yield to the Indonesian Communists. In the Dominican Republic, General Wessin y Wessin's followers had launched a fierce propaganda attack on the new provisional government, and it was feared that a coup might be in the making. In this country, the President was for the first time meeting with heavy resistance in Congress. His farm bill had suffered considerable mutilation in the House, and there was doubt whether the Senate would pass it. There was also fear of racial disturbances accompanying the opening of public schools all over the country.

Not all anxieties have been dissipated in the period between the diagnosis and treatment of his illness, but they are far fewer and milder. The cease-fire in Kashmir seems to be holding, and Peking does nothing but talk. Developments in Indonesia seem on the whole rather favorable from this government's point of view, and in Santo Domingo the provisional government is said to have a fairly firm purchase. Congress has done almost everything the President wanted it to do, and there have been no racial troubles on the scale of the riots in Los Angeles. The President was able to have his visit with the Pope and to give his party for Congress—a somewhat sour affair, unfortunately, since he would not allow the festivities to begin until the House had passed the bill to "beautify" (or, at any rate, make less hideous) highways paved with federal funds. He was incapacitated so briefly that no one gave much thought to what the Vice-President was up to—a matter that was of immense concern ten years ago. (Once, in those agitated days, there were rumors here to the effect that a junta was being formed by the Secretary of the Treasury, George Humphrey. The talk grew out of the fact that the Vice-President had gone to the Secretary's office—rather than vice versa—for a meeting with Humphrey and other officials.) Still, the Constitutional question involving the Vice-President's role at times like these remains unresolved. Only eight states have thus far ratified the Twenty-fifth Amendment, which settles the matter, though not to everyone's satisfaction.

THE long session of Congress now drawing to a close has been notable for several things, but not for the spirit or the quality of debate or for the resolution of any particularly subtle or complex questions. As it was expected to do from the moment the election returns were in last November, it has written into law almost the entire program that the President advocated during the campaign, but it has done so largely without discussion, controversy, or prolonged investigation. This is in part because, given the size of the administration majorities, discussion and investigation could have had little effect on the legislative products, and in part because for nearly two decades there had been a stupefying amount of discussion on most of the proposals to which the House and the Senate addressed themselves this year. In the House, though, there was one matter that was shot through with controversy and conflict—one issue, involving attitudes toward American society and concepts of democracy and representative government, over which informed and reasonable men could, and did, differ. It was known hereabouts as "the Mississippi challenge," or simply "the challenge," and it turned on the question of whether Mississippi's five congressmen were Constitutionally entitled to occupy the seats for which they had presented, last January 4th, certificates of election issued by the governor of the state. The matter was dealt with twice. The first time was on that same day in January, when, after failing to adopt a resolution that would have vacated the five seats at least until its Committee on Administration had investigated the election, the House, by a majority of a hundred and twenty-seven votes, authorized the Speaker to administer the prescribed oath of office. The authorizing resolution—the first resolution taken up by the House this year—noted that "any question involving the Members in question is one which should be dealt with under the laws governing elections." The matter came before the House again on September 17th, when, by a majority of eighty-five, a challenge to the Mississippi delegation's right to its seats, brought by seven citizens of Mississippi, was dismissed. It cannot be said that there was any very stimulating "debate" over this—the partisans had only an hour in which to air their views on the floor of the House—or that the central question was resolved; in fact, the House, in dismissing the challenge, struck from the motion of dismissal a clause saying that the Mississippi members were "entitled to their seats as Representatives of said districts and State." But there was much debate and controversy off the floor, and the reverberations are likely to be heard for the next several years.

The seven citizens who brought the challenge were all members of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party, an organization that first came to national attention when it issued a similar challenge to the Mississippi delegation to the National Democratic Convention in Atlantic City in August, 1964. The grounds for the Atlantic City challenge were essentially the same as those for this year's challenge. The most important was the systematic and almost total disenfranchisement of Mississippi Negroes. In 1964, only one Negro was registered for every seventeen whites. Less than seven per cent of Negroes over twenty-one were registered—compared with, for example, more than fifty per cent in Florida and Texas, and forty per cent in Georgia. Even in Alabama, the percentage was three times greater than in Mississippi. But there were other grounds. Mississippi is, and since the end of Reconstruction has been, a one-party state. In 1964, of a hundred and seventy-one members of its legislature only one was not a Democrat. (One member of the challenged delegation, Prentiss Walker, is a Republican, elected in last year's landslide vote for Senator Goldwater by Mississippi's "regular" Democrats.) The established state party—or what the Freedom Democrats call the "traditional" party—is independent of the national party, whose program and candidates it rarely endorses. (When Governor Paul Johnson was elected to his present term, he told his supporters that they had defeated "the Kennedys, the Adlai Stevensons, and the Northern Democratic overlords who would . . . like to destroy our way of life.") The established state party is as explicitly committed to segregation as the national party is committed to integration. In its 1960 platform, the state party said, "We believe in the segregation of the races. . . . We condemn integration." At its state convention last year, it resolved: "We believe in separation of the races in all phases of our society." There is no evidence of any connection between the party as an organization and the violence and terror that have met Negro efforts to participate in Mississippi politics. But in a one-party state political responsibility is indivisible, and it is a simple matter of fact that a number of those Mississippians who have committed and encouraged acts of violence owe their livelihood to the Mississippi Democratic Party, which, as Governor Johnson said at its 1964 convention, "is the framework, or the structure, through which Mississippians maintain political unity and operate self-government."

The Freedom Democratic Party was largely the idea of the militant students who have been spending summers in the South attempting to break down segregation in several fields. In conception and execution, it was brilliant. The established party had scarcely any more claim to be seated at a National Democratic Convention than a delegation of Republicans, Communists, or Prohibitionists. Its delegates—as they freely acknowledged at the time—had no intention of supporting the nominees of the Convention or the platform it adopted. On the other hand, the Freedom Democrats, when they organized at a convention in Jackson in April, 1964, pledged themselves to stand with the national party on all matters of policy and to support the national ticket. (This was at the beginning; as things turned out, they later became almost as hostile to the national leadership as their adversaries were.) They sent to Atlantic City an integrated delegation (sixty-four Negroes, four whites) and as their legal representative before the Credentials Committee appointed Joseph L. Rauh, Jr., possibly the most effective, and certainly the most indefatigable, civil-rights lawyer in the country, and also the leader of the Democratic Party in the District of Columbia. It was, of course, unlikely in the extreme that the Convention would do what Rauh and the Freedom Democrats were asking it to do—replace the delegation of the established party with that of the Freedom Democratic Party. Insurrection can crop up anywhere, for good reasons or bad, and men of power tend always to oppose it, not because they lack understanding of its causes or sympathy with its purposes but because they have a vested interest in procedural regularity. Nevertheless, Rauh's brief against seating the representatives of the established party was unassailable, and it was dramatically supported by the televised testimony of the Freedom Democrats on the brutality visited upon them when they sought no more than a voice in the determination of their own fate as human beings in Mississippi. The Convention agreed that the established party had forfeited its claim to representation. It further declared that it would never again seat delegates from states in which minorities were denied a voice in Party affairs. And while it did not concede that the Freedom Democrats had established an acceptable claim to be seated as a delegation, it at least acknowledged that their claim was stronger than that of the departed delegation and offered them two seats, with full voting privileges. It was a famous victory.

The Freedom Democrats, however, could not be persuaded that it was a victory. They called it a compromise—which, of course, it was—and would have no more to do with Rauh or with Aaron Henry, the only one of their leaders who was willing to accept it. At the time, most of their sympathizers within the national party put this down partly to the blindness of idealism, partly to the novice's failure to understand that politics is never anything but an organized system of compromise, and partly to the bitterness and alienation that are as much a native product of Mississippi as cotton. In time, though, some of their sympathizers began to wonder whether, as a consequence of alienation or for some other reason, they were not more interested in pursuing defeat, or the appearance of defeat, than in pursuing victory. The Convention had disestablished the established party and had recognized the Freedom Democrats' organization as one that had gone a long way toward establishing its legitimacy. The Freedom Democrats were in a position to contend against Governor Johnson's party in Mississippi as they had in Atlantic City. To be sure, the opportunities for doing so were anything but numerous. With Negro registration still below seven per cent, they could not hope even to make a respectable showing in any contest they might be permitted to enter. They could sue for recognition in the courts or bring suit against their rivals, but they could not expect justice from the local courts, which were all creatures of the one-party state, and strenuous and assertive political behavior would in all likelihood lead to more violence and terror. But they had risked violence before, and they were unprepared to disband after what they regarded as their betrayal and defeat in Atlantic City. A number of their supporters here—mainly in the House of Representatives but also from other parts of the government and from civil-rights organizations—began exploring the problem of getting the best legal advice they could find. In the end, the Freedom Democrats, who had persisted in saying that they wished to affiliate with the national party, were encouraged by party leaders here to take, or at least attempt, the legal steps necessary for recognition in Mississippi. It was certain that they would meet with rebuff by election officials—though, in fact, some of their candidates had succeeded in getting on the ballot in the June primaries—and defeat in the local courts. But this would open the way for an appeal in the federal courts. If they sought and failed to get places on the November ballot, they would be in a position to present themselves before the federal courts and the appropriate committees of Congress not merely as aggrieved citizens objecting to the way things were done in Mississippi but as bona-fide claimants to political recognition and as challengers of the legitimacy of the established party. They would also be in a position to go to Federal District Court and seek to have it enjoin Governor Johnson from issuing his certificates of election to the delegation that would be returned by the established party. Though the Voting Rights Act of 1965 had not yet been drafted, a powerful case could be made that Mississippi elections had been held in violation of the Fifteenth Amendment, which forbids disenfranchisement "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude," and several civil-rights laws already on the books.

These steps the Freedom Democrats chose not to take. They made no serious effort to get candidates on the November ballot and filed no protest against the Governor's issuance of election certificates. Up to a point, their reluctance to proceed as advised was understandable. The federal courts, though they have done a great deal to protect and extend civil rights and liberties, have not been of much assistance to the Negroes in their quest for political equality and power. Moreover, the Freedom Democratic Party had grown out of what was essentially a youth movement, which, like most youth movements, preferred political action to litigation. Yet what had been proposed was a combination of the two, with litigation being employed to facilitate political action. Moreover, the course that the Freedom Democrats eventually took involved them with lawyers by the score and in legalistic wrangles that went on until the middle of last month. They chose three of their leaders (Mrs. Fannie Lou Hamer, Mrs. Annie Devine, and Mrs. Victoria Gray) to run against three incumbent congressmen (Jamie L. Whitten, of the Second District; Prentiss Walker, of the Fourth District; and William M. Colmer, of the Fifth District) in an extra-legal election held not on November 3rd but over the four preceding days. The party "registered" its own voters, polled them, counted the ballots, and declared that the three candidates were entitled to the seats of those whose election Governor Johnson was shortly to certify. The registering and polling places had been sidewalks, shops, churches, and private homes. A rather touching aspect of this affair was that despite the abundant possibilities for what in another setting might have been called fraud, the tallying seems to have been uncommonly scrupulous. (In each of the three "contests," the Freedom Democrats claimed for their candidate a total significantly lower than that recorded for the incumbent in the regular election.) The argument, as it was to be presented here early this year, was that the election conducted on the streets by the Freedom Democrats—and recognized by them and by them alone—was more democratic, more Constitutional, and more worthy of respect than the one managed by the one-party state and recognized as "regular" and "official" by the authorities here. If the Freedom Democrats had run a mock election, the established party had run an election that was a mockery—one that had been corrupted long before it took place, not simply by systematic exclusion but by terror and murder.

At the outset, then, the Mississippi challenge was a movement by the Freedom Democrats and their attorneys not merely to unseat the Mississippi incumbents but to award three of their seats to persons who had been chosen in a canvass that was no more than a straw vote. In the first briefs filed, lengthy arguments were made in defense of such awards. The closing section of Mrs. Hamer's brief, for example, is headed "The undersigned Fannie Lou Hamer is the only lawfully elected representative to the Congress from the Second Congressional District of Mississippi," and this is followed by the argument that the election she won (in which no exclusion was practiced—Representative Whitten got 59 votes, against her 33,009) was the only fair and democratic one held in Mississippi in 1964. The danger of accepting any such reasoning was, of course, apparent to most members of Congress and to most civil-rights leaders. As Rauh, the original counsel to the Freedom Democrats, wrote in a memorandum, "The contention is without legal support because the Mrs. Hamer, Devine, and Gray were not elected in any regularly constituted state election. They were selected in a mock election, and there is no plausible legal basis on which the winners of a mock election can be deemed to have been elected to Congress under the Constitution and laws of the United States. Their illegal exclusion from the ballot is not a substitute for their election on the ballot." It was one thing, he pointed out, for the Party Convention to have seated Freedom Democrats. Conventions are pretty much a law unto themselves; their rules are loose and can be stretched. But if Congress were to accept the results of a mock election conducted by the Freedom Democrats, there could be beer-hall elections all over the country and extra-legal attempts by minorities of all sorts to blast their way into Congress. In time, the petitioners and their legal counsel yielded to this logic, but reluctantly and incompletely. They never formally withdrew their claims to be seated; they simply muted them. In the brief filed with the House on June 29th of this year, their counsel said, "While the Notices of Contest in the 2nd, 4th, and 5th Congressional Districts request the seating of the contestants as a possible form of relief, the contestants suggest in this Brief that the most appropriate form of relief in these cases under all the circumstances would be the vacating of the elections and the ordering of new Congressional elections under circumstances which would guarantee the full, fair, and free participation of Negro citizens in such elections."

The "candidates" did not press their claims as contestants, but it was in their names—and in the names of four other Freedom Democrats—that the challenge was made. The brief was headed "Brief of Contestants Urging the Vacating of the Contested Seats and the Holding of New Elections." Thus, three persons who had run in an extralegal election and four who had run in no elections presented themselves as "contestants" in the Mississippi elections. Under the procedure the challengers had chosen, the word "contestant" has been given rather a narrow and literal meaning. In most, but not all, previous cases of this sort, the House of Representatives, which under the Constitution is empowered to be "the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," has held that no one can "contest" an election unless he has himself been a candidate in the election he is contesting. It was with this in mind that the Freedom Democrats had, in the summer of 1964, been urged to take every step they could to qualify as regular candidates. On the first day of the session—the day the Speaker administered the oath to the representatives of the established party—the House received a challenge to the seating of Representative Richard L. Ottinger, of New York; on January 19th, it was dismissed on the ground that the man who had brought it (he had accused the Congressman-elect of having violated statutes that govern campaign expenditures) had not been himself a candidate for the seat. There are, to be sure, ways other than "contest" to unseat a congressman. Any member of Congress may submit a resolution protesting the seating of any other member. Private citizens in large or small numbers may file a "memorial" asking investigation or reconsideration of a particular member's right to the seat he occupies, or is about to occupy. But the general rule is that no one can contest an election after it has taken place who did not contest it at the time it took place.

Despite the flawed title of the challengers as "contestants," there was at the outset widespread sympathy in the House for the movement to unseat the seated delegation and hold a new election. Even on September 17th, when the challenge was dismissed, there were a hundred and forty-three votes against dismissal. Congressmen on both sides of the question were uneasy about relying strictly on precedent and about fussing over the failure of the Freedom Democrats to satisfy all the legal requirements. Whatever might be said of the mock election, it was not a moral outrage, as the regular election had been. On Negro disenfranchisement and the intimidation and terror employed to enforce it the House did not need evidence from the Freedom Democrats; in May the United States Commission on Civil Rights, which had been established by Congress in 1957 and had been studying the situation in Mississippi since 1960, submitted findings confirming everything that the Freedom Democrats and other civil-rights organizations had said. While the House is always disposed, other things being roughly equal, to decide in favor of its own members, there seemed a good chance early in the year that it would find it impossible to dismiss the Freedom Democrats' challenge. As time went on, though, the case of the Mississippi delegation was strengthened by the activities of the Freedom Democrats themselves—or, in most cases, actually by their counsel, which consisted mainly of Northern lawyers recruited by the National Lawyers Guild, an organization that has in the past been less notable for the aid it has rendered civil-rights causes than for its identification with Communist causes. For one thing, the lawyers, many of them men of enormous skill and varied experience, did their legal work atrociously. The "contest" procedure requires the assembling of a great deal of paper in the form of testimony and depositions. This is to be submitted to the clerk of the House, who, if he finds it all in order, has it printed for distribution in the House. After many delays, almost three thousand printed pages of documents were submitted, but with so many procedural oversights that the clerk was able to say that their failure to conform to established standards made it impossible for him to order their printing. In time, members of the Administration Committee prevailed upon him to forget the established standards and print them anyway, which he did—in three volumes, under the curious title "Papers Omitted in Printing Pursuant to Provisions of the Statutes Involving the Five Congressional Districts in the State of Mississippi." Meanwhile, the Washington spokesmen for the Freedom Democrats were subjecting congressmen—those who were sympathetic to them as well as those who were not—to the kind of pressure that invariably erodes support. There was a sit-in demonstration by students. There was an effort to have the challenge recognized as the only really important bit of business before the House. To this end, supporters of the Freedom Democrats attempted to disparage the voting-rights legislation that the rest of the civil-rights movement was demanding. "At this time," a February paper on "Voting Legislation" issued by the Freedom Democrats said, "we see it as the duty and responsibility of the Civil Rights Movement to militate against any maneuver that would dissipate this pressure [i.e., for the challenge] by the tokenism of still another fraudulently ineffectual piece of legislation." The suspicion grew that some of the challengers were less interested in winning a solid political victory than in demonstrating the futility of legal procedures in this society and the corruption of such of its established institutions as the Congress and its committees.

The House Administration Committee, which had been instructed to file a report on the challenge, is, by and large, a liberal committee. Many of its members belong to the Democratic Study Group, which has worked closely for several years with all civil-rights groups, and most of its members were sympathetic toward the challenge, even when they were being addressed as "finks" by some of its proponents. But the majority could find no way to report favorably on it without, as it seemed to them, abandoning due process and their Constitutional responsibilities. Neither, for that matter, could those who signed a minority report, which went no further than to urge continued study. It was not simply a matter of the precedents' being overwhelmingly against the challenge. New precedents could have been established. The basic fact, the majority found, was that an election had taken place in Mississippi on November 3, 1964, and that it had been conducted in accordance with federal laws and with Mississippi laws, none of which could be regarded by Congress as un-Constitutional, "inasmuch as they have not been set aside by the decision of any court of competent jurisdiction." That citizens in large numbers had been disenfranchised was altogether clear, but this did not in itself constitute evidence that the particular incumbents were improperly sworn in. The Committee majority recommended dismissal of the challenge, but its report put Southern congressmen on notice that this might be the last time any such recommendation could be made. "The Voting Rights Act of 1965 is now the law of the land, in full force and effect," it said. "The committee is cognizant of the fact that the alleged practices complained of . . . in the 1964 Mississippi elections would constitute violations of the new act if occurring subsequent to its enactment. There is now clear and adequate legal authority for the Federal Government to protect the rights of voters and to assure the rights of all citizens to become registered voters."

Yale's dramatic cartographic discovery — the earliest map of America yet found

The Vinland Map and the Tartar Relation

Here is the most exciting cartographic discovery of this century—the earliest and only map ever found indisputably showing any portion of the Western Hemisphere and, specifically, the North American continent as discovered by the Norse under Leif Ericson. This map, along with the Tartar Relation, a manuscript of Asian exploration, was part of a medieval history written in the thirteenth century. The story of their accidental rediscovery, the painstaking research necessary to establish their authenticity, and the conclusions of the British and American experts assigned to this task are told in this volume.

When the motion to dismiss came to the House floor on September 17th, it was amended so that it contained no implication that the Mississippi delegation was "entitled" to its seats. Even so, enormous pressure was exerted against dismissal by the civil-rights movement. Martin Luther King wired Representative John Conyers, Jr., of Michigan, that he regarded the majority report as a "testament of shame." Under the circumstances, it was exceedingly difficult for a congressman with any number of Negro constituents or any personal standing in the civil-rights movement to favor dismissal, and, in fact, most such congressmen voted against it—some because they agreed with Dr. King and some because, in spite of disagreement, they found the political risks too heavy. But some, who were no less committed to civil rights, stuck with the majority and exposed themselves to obloquy and reprisal. Among these was Frank Thompson, of New Jersey, chairman of the Democratic Study Group and a member of the Administration Committee, who had a large hand in drafting the report. Others on the majority side were Representatives John Blatnik, of Minnesota; Richard Bolling, of Missouri; John Moss, of California; James O'Hara, of Michigan; and Morris Udall, of Arizona. "I voted for the challenge, and I'm sure I'll get plenty of credit for it," one New York City congressman said. "But it was no act of courage. The courageous ones were those who will now be called rats and finks on every side."

HUD MAKES MAJOR MOVES FOR BUSINESS PARTICIPATION

Secretary Robert C. Weaver of the U. S. Department of Housing and Urban Development made two moves today to encourage private industry to take a more active role in meeting the housing goals set by President Johnson.

He announced the appointment of General B. A. Schriever, (USAF Ret.) former commander of the Air Force Systems Command and currently an industrial adviser involving urban affairs, as a special Consultant to the Secretary for Business Participation.

At the same time, the Secretary established an Office of Business Participation in the Department and chose Robert F. McAuliffe, a systems planning executive from International Business Machines Corporation, as its Director, and Robert Dubinsky as Assistant Director.

Secretary Weaver pointed out that the President's national goal of 6 million new low- and moderate-income housing units over the next 10 years will require a tremendous expansion of the nation's present capacity to produce housing. For 1969 alone, a target of 300,000 housing starts, an increase of three-fold over current production levels, has been set for this type of housing.

"Clearly, home builders and general contractors must increase their productive capacity if we are to succeed," he said. "But we must also explore new ways of more fully utilizing the managerial expertise, financial resources, and commitment of the private sector in this undertaking."

"Private industry's involvement may take different forms," the Secretary said. "Some may choose to sponsor or manage housing projects. Others will participate in systems management or research and development activities. Still others may elect to produce housing in the inner city or build entire new communities, utilizing, to a large extent, I believe, the proven talents of professional home builders and contractors.

"But whatever the involvement, American industry can expect reasonable profits commensurate with the risks involved. And from the standpoint of the under privileged, the participation of corporate America in urban activities should be a welcome addition by its offering increased opportunities for better housing, as well as the additional employment flowing from such additional production."

Through the Office of Business Participation, the Secretary pointed out, HUD hopes to establish a focal point to secure the active cooperation of the business, industrial and financial community in meeting national housing and urban development goals.

The Office will develop innovative plans and programs to attract business interests as partners in HUD activities, to help the business community develop a better understanding of the ways in which it can contribute to national urban objectives, and participate in such HUD programs as rehabilitation, Model Cities, urban renewal, "Turnkey" public housing construction, and rent supplements.

The role of General Schriever, according to Secretary Weaver, will be to counsel on methods and approaches for attracting wide business involvement in urban activities, to help develop incentives for combining the resources of the private sector with those available under HUD programs, and to bring the application of high level technology and advanced management to bear on urban problems.

"To meet the objective set by the President, not only do we need new builders, but we will need new industries in such activities as rehabilitation, and we will need to take advantage of the latest advances in technology," the Secretary pointed out.

Since retirement in 1966, General Schriever has devoted a great deal of attention and time to urban matters involving industry participation. During his military career, he was responsible for the nation's intercontinential ballistic development program since its inception. In guiding the Air Force Systems Command, he supervised the research, development, procurement and production actions to place advanced operational aerospace systems in the Air Force inventory.

He also directed the Manned Orbiting Laboratory and supervised many of the nation's highest priority space programs. Born in Bremen, Germany, in 1910, he migrated with his family to New Braunfels, Texas, as a youngster. He received a bachelor's degree at Texas A & M College and a second lieutenant's commission in the field artillery. He later earned a master's degree in aeronautical engineering from Stanford University and holds many honorary degrees from leading educational institutions. His military career began in 1932. During World War II he flew bombing missions in the Pacific Theater and commanded the advanced headquarters of the Far East Service Command. At retirement, he held the rank of full General.

Mr. McAuliffe, born in Montclair, New Jersey, served as an advance systems planner for IBM, where he organized and directed the evolution of urban government information systems.

Prior to IBM, he was associated with the Mobil Chemical Corporation and Union Carbide Corporation. He holds an MBA degree from Harvard Business School and an ME degree from Stevens Institute of Technology. He is a captain in the USAF Inactive Reserve.

Mr. Dubinsky, born in St. Louis, Missouri, was graduated from Harvard College and did graduate work at Kings College, University of London. After working as a real estate broker and as a member of the Planning Commission in St. Louis, he joined HUD in 1966. His most recent position was that of director of the Neighborhood Facilities program.

BIOGRAPHY OF
GENERAL B. A. SCHRIEVER, USAF (Ret.)
SPECIAL CONSULTANT FOR BUSINESS PARTICIPATION

General Schriever retired August 31, 1966, as Commander of the Air Force Systems Command. He was also director of the Manned Orbiting Laboratory (MOL) program at the time of his retirement.

Subsequently, General Schriever served as a consultant to industry, performing services of both a technical and management nature. He served on the boards of several leading industrial corporations.

General Schriever had a distinguished career in the service of his country. Combat service in the South Pacific during World War II was followed by Pentagon assignments and a year at the National War College.

In 1954 he assumed command of the Air Force Western Development Division (WDD) at Inglewood, California. In this capacity he directed both the nation's highest priority projects -- the development of the Intercontinental Ballistic Missile program (ICBM), and the Air Force's initial space programs. He was responsible for pushing forward research and development on all phases of the Atlas, Titan, Thor and Minuteman missiles.

In 1961 he was named Commander of the Air Force Systems Command and promoted to the rank of full General.

The General resides at 4910 Loughboro Road, N. W., Washington, D.C., with his wife, Dora, and daughter, Barbara. Other children are Captain Brett A. Schriever, USAF and Mrs. Dodie S. Moeller.

Biography of
Robert F. McAuliffe, Director,
Office of Business Participation

Robert F. McAuliffe, 36, was an Advance Systems Planner for International Business Machines Corporation prior to his appointment as Director of the new HUD Office of Business Participation.

In that capacity he helped develop the corporate strategy for IBM's involvement in the urban environment. His overall job was to develop, structure and evaluate IBM's opportunities in that field.

Other special business experience included the Mobil Chemical Corporation, where he served as a Special Projects Manager, and the Union Carbide Plastics Company, where he was a field sales engineer.

He received his ME degree in 1953 from the Stevens Institute of Technology, and an MBA from Harvard Business School in 1962.

From 1954 to 1956 he served in the Air Force, and commanded an early-warning radar site in northern Japan, where he directed a $1.3 million reconstruction of facilities damaged by ice storms. He is presently a captain in the Inactive Reserve.

Born in Montclair, N. J., he currently lives in White Plains, New York.

What Southern Garment Workers Want . . .

Minimum Annual Income: Good Wages and Dignity

When we elect the next president of the United States this fall, we will also be electing a sizable number of Senators and Representatives. Because even the best president can do very little if Congress does not support his program, it is very important that we elect people to office who represent working people and who have the best interest of all the citizens at heart.

This summer, the candidates will be making promises, promising us the things they think we want. Therefore, we should let them know exactly what we do want, how we want our country to grow and improve in the next few years.

What do garment workers in the Southeast Region want? They want jobs—and decent wages. They want good health—the best possible health—for themselves and their families. They want education for their children. And they realize that these things should not be privileges but rights, that they belong not just to part of the population, but to all citizens of the United States.

Let's be more specific. Many garment workers still remember the depression (although some of them were only children then), when men were out of work all over the country and no jobs were available. Workers marched the streets and even went to Washington to demand jobs. Today, the same cry for jobs is being heard in the ghettos of American cities, among the "hard core unemployed" white and black, and in the depressed areas of Appalachia and the rural South, from those who are not sharing in the "prosperity."

Jobs must be found. If necessary, the government must provide jobs.

Garment workers, of course, have jobs. But when there is a strike, they are only too aware of the people without jobs who are willing to take the strikers place in the factory. And even when there is no strike, garment workers who are trying to organize a Union are told: "If you join the Union, I

Yes, there are many workers who would be pathetically grateful to get that minimum wage—the wage that is now $1.60 an hour only because organized Labor fought to raise it to that level. And this is one reason why many garment workers are now realizing how much a legislated Minimum Annual Income as well as Minimum Hourly Income could do for them. Why?

There are many reasons why people cannot work. Mothers with children cannot afford babysitters and do not wish to leave their children home alone—and who can blame them? Children cannot support themselves. Children whose parents cannot work should not be left to starve.

In this country of plenty, there are 10 million hungry, the greatest number of them in the South. For instance, of the 250 counties in the nation with the most hungry people, 47 are in the state of Georgia alone.

When happens when people are hungry? Malnutrition, even when it doesn't kill or lead to disease, can damage both mind and body. It can cause brain damage and can slow down both physical grown and ability to learn.

A recent report by a group of private citizens said it pretty bluntly:

"No other Western country permits such a large proportion of its people to endure the lives we press on our poor. To make 4/5 of a nation more affluent than any people in history, we have degraded 1/5 mercilessly."

Of course many garment workers—especially those in Union shops—are not a part of that bottom fifth, but they nevertheless have a stake in the Minimum Annual Income. Because as long as there are people starving in this country, garments wages are not going to be very high. Garment manufacturer's pay as little as they possibly can. If there is no Union, they pay the minimum wage. If there's a Union, wages go up by 20¢ an hour or more but they can only go up so far.

The higher the bottom, the better off garment workers will be. The garment industry continually moves to the area of lowest wages, to towns that promise them the cheapest rent and the cheapest workers. If there were a minimum income as the right of every citizen, garment factories might have to offer decent

In Miami, there are garment workers who are not getting the minimum wage. It's illegal, of course, but still they do not quit or take their bosses to court. Because they do not want to be hungry. Garment workers should not have to choose between miserable wages and starvation. It is time to win some more of that dignity that we have been talking about for 50 years—and one way to do that is by winning the right to choose between decent wages and a minimal but nonstarvation income.

The Right to Good Health

Another thing which garment workers have come to realize as their right is good health—and the health care which makes good health possible.

But good health has not yet become a right in the United States. In 1948, a National Health Insurance plan was suggested by President Truman. Since then, we've gone backwards and, twenty years later, no one is even talking about a health plan for every American citizen.

As a result, we are falling behind. In 1950 we had one of the lowest infant mortality rates in the world. We ranked 6th. Today we rank only 16th. For every 1000 babies who live, 25 die. In improverished counties where people are hungry, this figure goes up: in some places, it is 10 times as high.

All of the countries with lower infant mortality rates than the United States have systems of providing healthy care for the vast majority of their citizens.

Meanwhile, it gets more and more expensive to be sick in this country, and even a skilled worker, whose wages put him squarely in the middle class, can easily be totally wiped out by an unexpected illness.

We are glad that hospital workers, after years of misery, are now covered by the minimum wage. But with hospital costs spiralling, the individual citizen needs help in paying his bills.

Are we to continue raising more and more money and winning larger and larger Health Unions—including the Southeast Region of the ILGWU—are now studying this problem.

But that alone will not solve the problem of good health in this country. There must be some form of national health insurance. Free medical care must be made available to all, whether or not they can afford to pay.

We must make good health a right.

The Children's Future

Finally, there is the matter of educating our children.

Many garment workers are women with small children. By the time they finish paying for babysitters, their wages don't go very far.

In Spartanburg, the Union has tried to overcome this problem. Plans are underway for a childcare center. The Union and the company, Spartan Undies, are both willing to spend money to help set up the childcare center. The hold-up now is the government. Because of cutbacks in the poverty program, the government has refused to contribute its share.

The childcare center proposal includes remedial medical care for the children, a hot lunch and 2 snacks every day, preschool training and a graduated scale of payment, depending on what the mother can afford to pay. Care would be cheaper for a second or third child in the program. Eventually the program would be broadened to include a summer program for school children.

Regional Director Martin Morand, Maida Springer Kemp and Evelyn Dubrow, have spent much time in Washington trying to set up this program. Legislators are enthusiastic, but can offer no financial support.

European countries which are not so affluent as the United States have been able to afford child care centers. Why can we not?

In our drive for more TVs and more cars, we have forgotten the basics, things like health and education, and these basics are very important to garment workers.

As we approach the end of the Vietnam war, we must begin to think about the money and resources which will become available for use in this country. Indeed, we must find ways of putting these resources to work in order to Help in Figuring Piece Rates Given at Brunswick, Douglas

Classes in Brunswick, Georgia on Saturday, April 27 and in Douglas, Georgia on Saturday, May 11, have been helpful to members in Locals 519 and 586 who had requested help in figuring piece rates and add-ons.

The class at Brunswick, which was held at the Holiday Inn, was the second in a series of classes for the Local 519 members.

58 members attended the class. The discussion was led by Business Agent Harry Berger and Chairlady Evelyn Trull.

The discussions were on two subjects: 1) how to figure your earnings and 2) how to figure your overtime.

The classes in Douglas were similar to the Brunswick classes.

In Brunswick, the members were given a chart which will help them figure add-ons. The chart converts ticket earnings into real earnings, so that the operator knows exactly how much she has made. Numerical examples were used in Douglas.

Those who attended the schools reported the continued need for this type of information and discussed the need for additional classes which are now being planned.

A movie, "With These Hands," was also shown at the Brunswick school. Both schools concluded with lunch.

A Note from Dr. Heilman

Dear Mr. Cheponis,

You wrote that Lucille Watson, Chairlady, Local 408 in Fayetteville wondered when the mobile unit might get there.

All I can say at this time is that I am very concerned about this problem also and am studying plans for a different system. It is very important that members keep up regular checkups with their own doctors—a minimum would be a yearly pelvic checkup.

Sincerely yours,
R. B. Heilman, M.D.

Examiners at Standard Shop Get Raise By Joining Union

When the examiners at the Standard Textile factory in Charlotte, North Carolina, decided to join the Union recently, they won themselves an immediate 15¢ raise.

The examiners had never belonged to the Union before and had not been included in the bargaining Unit. Early in February, they signed Union cards and became Union members.

North Carolina District Council Manager Jesse Riddle immediately negotiated with the company for the new Union members and, as a result, their minimum went from $1.75 to $1.90 an hour.

The examiners check the knitted material which is produced in the plant.

Standard Textile Workers belong to Local 530.

Firing at Debby Dress, Miami Prevented by Effective Union

The workers at Debby Dress in Miami found out once again that a strong Union—and a strong Chairlady—can keep them from being stepped on.

On the afternoon of May 6, the company attempted to fire 6 workers, claiming that these workers had too much makeup pay.

Thanks to quick action on the part of the Union, the workers were back on the job the next morning. Business Agent Bill Krost, along with Chairlady Helen Muzio, met with the company and resolved the problem.

The company also agreed that all rates on new styles will be studied with the shop price committee so that new prices will be adjusted and fair to the workers before the new style is practically finished.

Chairlady Helen Muzio will soon be retiring. She has worked hard to build the Union in the Debby Dress shop and she will be very much missed.

200 Workers in Georgia Town Battle Industrial Serfdom

ZEBULON, Ga.—Another battle in the long struggle to create the New South has broken out here.

Two hundred under-paid workers at the Besco Products Co., all Negroes, have organized in Local 315 and have taken on the town's leading family in a fight for union recognition.

At the same time, the workers, with other Negroes of Zebulon, are boycotting the school system in a dispute over the hiring of a white to replace a Negro principal who resigned. The Southern Christian Leadership Conference is directing the boycott, and is also giving strong support to the strike.

At Besco, which is the larger of the town's two industrial plants, the union's picketline is up during daylight hours and the morale of the strikers is excellent.

"We expect this may be a long strike," said Int'l Rep. Guy Dickinson. "The owner of the plant had had his way so long he's forgotten that people have a right to question what he does."

Recognition Request Ignored

The union has written to the owner, William Edwards, for recognition. Not having heard from him, Local 315 petitioned the NLRB in Atlanta Sept. 10 for a bargaining election.

Fighting back, the company is suing the SCLC; Robert Curtis, shop chairman of the local's unit at Pomona Products in Griffin, 15 miles away, and a leader in both the boycott and the organizing; and the boycott committee.

The battle began during the summer over the school board's hiring a white principal in place of a Negro at one of the town's three schools. When the schools opened Thursday, Sept. 5, Negro parents kept their children out of school.

That afternoon the Negro workers at Besco walked off their jobs in support of the school boycott.

Thursday night Curtis, who lives in Zebulon, called the RWDSU's Atlanta office and said the workers wanted a union. Between Friday morning and Sunday evening, '315' Org. Hershel Holmes, Jim Freeman of the AFL-CIO staff, Dickinson and Curtis signed up more than 200 of the 250 employees.

On Monday morning, the union sought a meeting with the plant owner, but Edwards refused. Picketing began that morning, and later in the day the company closed the plant.

The company has shown no indication of bargaining. It has, instead, released pimento growers from their contracts, indicating that it may stay shut for the rest of the pimento-packing season rather than negotiate.

The owner and his family exert a good deal of control over the workers both in the plant and in town. The workers, some of whom have 30 years of service, get only $1.60 an hour, the federal minimum. Most of the employees don't punch time cards; the supervisor puts down whatever amount he wants the worker to earn.

Boss Forces Kickback

Some years ago, the company was found in violation of the Wage-Hour law, and the U.S. Labor Dept. ordered the company to reimburse the workers. Edwards sent out the checks, but he told the workers the money was rightfully his and coerced them into returning the checks.

There are no benefits. No one has ever had a paid vacation or a holiday or any other benefit.

The plant operates nine months a year. Twenty-five workers, most of them whites, work the entire year. A few of the Negro employees work enough hours to get unemployment benefits during the three months the plant is shut down, but most have to shift for themselves.

In the town, which has 1,500 people, the situation is not much better. Edwards' family owns a used car lot and the bank in addition to the cannery.

"The people work in the plant to get the money to buy a car and they finance it through the bank, so the Edwardses get all the money right back," Dickinson said.

He said the workers badly need financial help.

"We think many people would like to help," he said, "and anyone who would can send his contribution to Besco Strikers Fund, Local 315, 1838 Stewart Ave. S.W., Atlanta, Ga. 30315."

Three-Year Struggle Wins Pact at Atlanta Goodyear

ATLANTA, Ga.—It took a four-day strike and more than three years time before Local 315 was able to negotiate a first agreement for the 29 employees of the Goodyear Tire and Rubber shop here.

At the signing only two of the original workers who were employed when the union organized the shop were still there.

The three-year agreement provides a wage increase the first year of from 14 cents to 44 cents an hour, and hikes of eleven cents an hour across-the-board in each of the next two years.

Workers will receive two weeks vacation after one year, three after eight and four weeks after 15 years of service. There are seven paid holidays including the employee's birthday, sickness and accident coverage, $8,000 life insurance, six days paid sick leave, and beginning with the seventh day's absence, up to 39 weeks disability at $70 a week.

Rep. James Dickinson headed the negotiators, who included Rep. Hershel Holmes and the two original workers, Charlie Smith and Coyle Wise.

The local organized the plant in 1965, and when the company became aware of the union's activity, Goodyear fired one of the leaders of the campaign. The union filed unfair labor practice charges and was upheld by the NLRB's regional director. The company appealed the ruling to the board in Washington, and when the union was again sustained, Goodyear took the case to a Federal Court.

The court's ruling was in favor of the union, and in June 1968, three long years after it started to organize, the local was certified.

After a number of meetings over a two-month period had failed to produce an agreement, the workers walked out Aug. 30. After four days, the company finally agreed to the first contract.

150 Dairy Workers Gain Wage Hikes, Pension Plan

BIRMINGHAM, Ala.—One hundred and fifty members of Local 101A ratified a renewal contract with the White Dairy Co. Sept. 11.

The pact provides for a two-percent graduated commission increase for the 100 route salesmen and a 30-cent per hour wage boost for the 50 production workers.

The workers also won participation in the RWDSU International Pension Plan, a fourth week of vacation after 20 years of service, an increase in the number of sick leave days and an increase in the funeral leave.

The company also agreed to pay the full premiums for health and welfare insurance at a cost of $12 to $14 per month. The workers previously paid one-half of the cost of that coverage.

In addition the number of off-days for route salesmen who work a six-day week was increased to 21 days per year.

State Dir. C. T. Daniel led the union bargaining committee.

White Dairy has been under contract to Local 101A for more than 12 years.

Pay Hike Won in Memphis

MEMPHIS, Tenn.—Local 19 has negotiated a raise in pay for more than 100 employees of the Buckeye Celluloid Co. through a wage reopener.

The reopener resulted in a wage increase of nine cents an hour across-the-board, and brought the new minimum wage to $2.03 an hour. Local 19 Pres. Earl Fisher headed the union's negotiators.

The union's agreement with the company, which extracts and processes soybean and cottonseed oil, expires Sept. 28, 1970.

Pay Boosts, Shorter Week Gained at Alabama Bakery

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. — Local 441 has negotiated a five-day work week and a 30-cent per hour across-the-board wage boost for 25 workers in a renewal with the Home Baking Co.

Under the terms of the three-year pact the workers are assured a ten-cent per hour wage increase each year. In addition, the company agreed to reopen the contract one year from the Aug. 3 effective date for talks on wages and fringes.

Heading the union bargaining committee were Ala. Council Rep. Alfred Wright, Robert Hightower and Bill Blackstone.

'15A' Nets 55c an Hr. at Stein-Hall

CHARLESTON, S.C. — Local 15A has negotiated a 45-cent an hour wage boost for 42 workers in a 3½-year renewal with the Stein-Hall Chemical Co.

The 55½-cent per hour package, which was signed Aug. 16 and is retroactive to July 29, provides for an immediate 15-cent an hour wage increase and an additional ten cents in November. In February 1970 and in February 1971, the workers will again receive ten-cent boosts. The union also negotiated a 25-cent per hour increase in all starting minimums.

Vacation schedules were improved to provide one week after six months on the job, two weeks after one year, three after ten and four weeks after 25 years of service. The workers also won eight paid holidays, a four-cent per hour increase in the company's contribution for health and welfare benefits the second year and an additional 2½-cent increase in the third.

Also included in the contract were provisions for plant-wide seniority, double-time and a half for work on all holidays and paid uniforms.

Leading the negotiating committee were Local 15A Pres. John Cummings, Vice-Pres. Isaiah Bennett, William Lee, Julius Brown, Arron White, James Graham and Regional Dir. Irving Lebold.

Stein-Hall, a chemical innovator in the food and textile industry, has been under contract to Local 15A for three years.

Ont. Labor Leaders Blast Rand Report As Threat to Collective Bargaining

TORONTO, Ont.—Leaders of Ontario labor have blasted the Rand Report, made public Sept. 5, as threatening the end of collective bargaining in the province.

"The main recommendations of the report, if carried out, would put labor unions in a legal straightjacket, reduce their effectiveness and make collective bargaining worthless," said Canadian Dir. George Barlow.

The proposals are based on investigations by Commissioner Ivan C. Rand, 84, a former justice of the Canadian Supreme Court.

One of the chief proposals is the formation of an 11-man industrial tribunal that would have wide powers to inquire into wages, hours of work and fringe benefits; establish and limit the number of pickets in strikes, act on applications to terminate strikes and serve as arbitrators.

The tribunal, as proposed, would consist of a president, two deputy presidents and eight commissioners. Its decision would be final and not be subject to appeal to any higher body.

Other labor leaders and the New Democratic Party in Ontario have vehemently rejected the report, with the harshest criticism aimed at the proposal to set up the industrial tribunal with sweeping powers.

The New Democratic Party was strongly opposed to the recommendations in the Rand Report. NDP Leader Donald C. MacDonald said, "It would discourage labor and management from settling disputes on their own, and detract from the freedom of collective bargaining."

David Archer, president of the Ontario Federation of Labor, said flatly the proposals would not work and would not be desirable.

Douglas Hamilton, secretary-treas- of the federation, said, "I doubt that labor or management will take the recommendations seriously."

Ontario's Labor Minister, Dalton Bales, said there would be no move by the government to implement any part of the report until it had been carefully studied.

Among the Rand proposals are:

• The government would be empowered to designate any industry, business or service as "essential," and thereby be able to ban a strike, or order a resumption of work. Designation could be made before or after a strike. If such a dispute is not settled by negotiation, it must be referred to the tribunal.

GEORGE BARLOW

• The report harshly condemns strikes by public employees, which, it said, are against the public, and recommends strong anti-strike penalties.

• The report would give the tribunal, under certain circumstances, the right to impose arbitration in strikes of more than 90 days if there is evidence of bad faith in bargaining. It gives the tribunal authority to terminate any strike after six months.

• While upholding injunctions, it would prohibit the use of ex-parte injunctions—temporary, restricting court orders, which are obtained without notice to the other side—except in emergencies.

• It would protect the jobs of strikers except for gross misconduct and would ban mass picketing and organizational picketing.

• The report would restrict employers from permanently replacing strikers and ban the use of workers from outside the bargaining unit to do the work of strikers. Strikers could not, however, take other regular employment since that might prolong the duration of a strike. The report would bar the use of professional strikebreakers but would permit the use of supervisory personnel normally associated with production work.

• The report proposes heavy penalties against unions and their leaders for any illegal action ranging from violation of picketing regulations to illegal strikes, and recommends that unions be made legal entities capable of being sued and suing in their own name.

• The report contains a proposal that unions conduct a mail ballot of all employees in a bargaining unit on the question of ratifying or rejecting an agreement. It would require the union and the employer to draw up a joint summary on the terms of the settlement or terms offered. This would accompany the ballot.

• The report wants to bar the headquarters of any international union outside Canada from interfering with the terms reached in Canada by a local union and approved by an authorized Canadian representative of the union.

Sask. Labor Body To Meet Oct. 3-5

PRINCE ALBERT, Sask.—The Saskatchewan Federation of Labor will hold its convention at the Coronet Motor Hotel Oct. 3 thru Oct. 5.

RWDSU locals that are planning to attend should send the names of their delegates and requests for room reservations to RWDSU Rep. W. G. Gilbey at 415 21st Street East, Saskatoon.

The deadline for locals to submit resolutions and constitutional amendments is Sept. 21. They must be signed by two officers of the local and mailed to the federation at 1601 11th Avenue in Regina.

REGINA, Sask.—After several unsuccessful tries, the Saskatchewan Joint Board has organized a majority of the 65 employees at King Size Photo, a film developer and processor here, and expects to be certified.

"We have signed up more than 70 percent of the employees, and we look forward to winning certification easily," Int'l Rep. Len Wallace, who headed the organizing drive, said.

The drive began when one of the employees came to the union and said the employees wanted to belong to the RWDSU.

"It's an awful place to work," Wallace said. "The wage rates are as low as $1.07 an hour. The employees work a 42½-hour week, and there is compulsory overtime, ten hours a week. It's a real old-fashioned place."

Wallace also reported that the Joint Board's membership has reached 2,400, which is close to the union's all-time high in the province.

"We have a number of other drives in progress," he said, "and if these are successful, we should set a new mark for the RWDSU in Saskatchewan."

Pact For 3,500 at Dominion Hinged to Warehouse Strike

TORONTO, Ont.—A week-old strike of 400 RWDSU members employed at two Dominion Stores warehouses here may snowball to include 3,500 RWDSU members at 280 Dominion stores in southern Ontario.

At the Record's presstime, union negotiators, headed by Ontario Sup. Hugh Buchanan, company bargainers and a conciliation officer from the provincial Dept. of Labor were meeting to try to settle the warehousemen's strike, which began Sept. 5.

The key issue in the dispute is wages. At present, the RWDSU members earn about $102 a week. Other outstanding issues are holidays, improved welfare coverage and rewording of the contract on hours of work and overtime.

Although a new agreement for the 3,500 store employees has been reached, the agreement will be nullified if the warehouse strike is not settled by Friday morning, Sept. 13, while The Record is in the mail.

The two Toronto warehouses supply up to 75 percent of the merchandise sold at the 80 Dominion stores in Toronto, and a smaller percentage at the 200 other RWDSU stores in the province.

'440' Wins Arbitration

OTTAWA, Ont.—A recent arbitration, brought by Local 440, will prevent the Kemptville Creameries of this city from introducing a night shift.

The union had protested on the grounds that its agreement did not call for a night shift.

The daytime employees work until 6 p.m. each day, and they were willing to work later at the overtime rates called for in the agreement. The company had other ideas, preferring instead to pay regular rates with just a small shift premium to a full night-time shift.

An independent arbitrator, Hugh Poulin, heard the case and he ruled in favor of the union.

Consumer Price Index at Peak

OTTAWA (CPA) — Figures released by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics show that the Consumer Price Index reached a record high of 154.7 in June. The index, based on 1949 equalling 100, was 148.8 a year ago. The increase of six points was four percent.

Most components in the index—food, housing, clothing, transportation, health and personal care — moved higher.

The housing index rose to 157.6, mainly because of higher rents in such cities as Halifax, Montreal, Ottawa and Calgary.

The index for health and personal care went to 197.7.

While there is no comparable index of average family incomes, the DBS industrial composite index of weekly wages and salaries, based on 1961 equalling 100, rose to 139.3 in April from 130.8 in April 1967. In the year ending April 1968, wages and salaries rose 8.5 points, or about 6.5 percent. In the same period, the Consumer Price Index rose 4.2 percent.

The DBS estimate for average weekly wages in manufacturing in the month of May 1968 was $104.49, in April 104.26 and in March $100.63.

The housing index accounts for 32 percent of the total index, food prices 28 percent, clothing 11 percent, transportation 12 percent, health and personal care 7, recreation and reading 5, and tobacco and alcohol 6.

The Bureau is working on a new index with 1961 as a base. The index is the result of a survey of prices of about 300 kinds of goods and services.

CRISIS IN OUR CITIES

By NORMAN HILL

There are at least two components of the present crisis in our cities.

There is the crisis of material poverty, in which millions of urban Negroes are now rebelling against chronic joblessness, growing slums, poor schools, bad housing, and inadequate medical care.

Equally grave, there is the crisis of spirit and aspiration, in which the majority of young Negroes are now demanding individual dignity, a climate conducive to the creation of self-respect, and the right to become a part of the decision-making process that affects the solution of their problems and the regulation of their affairs.

These two crises are closely interlocked. For if the problems of jobs, schools, housing and health were solved tomorrow, the cities would still have to contend with the growing and militant desire of young Negroes to be dignified and self-respecting human beings capable of playing a role in the determination of their lives.

This is not to say that the urban crisis is one that plagues Negroes alone. Sixty-eight percent of the poor people in our society, and a substantial number of poor people in our cities, are white. To talk about poverty in the cities, then, is really to talk about the poverty of all poor Americans who live in the cities.

Partly because of the lack of coordinated effort among the black and white poor, the federal government is not listening to anybody, and shows no signs that it means to listen seriously to the poor.

This, in America, is ironic and paradoxical. Those who control our major national institutions have set the highest priority on the principle of due process, the right of citizens to petition for redress of grievances. Yet the response to lawful petition and democratic strategies is feeble compared to the federal hysteria that is usually evoked in response to those who threaten to tear our cities and our nation apart.

While the foregoing may help to illustrate the nature of the urban crisis, and the factors which aggravate this crisis, it is an even more complex problem than is generally assumed.

Therefore, in addition to measures being used to grapple with the frustration and decay within the cities, there need to be at least three further strategies:

- Creation of a national job pool. This means that the federal government must take the responsibility for moving city residents to where the new jobs are, outside of the ghettos or outside of the cities. It also means that the government must make it possible for people to relocate in these new employment centers by providing integrated housing and schooling for the new migrants.
- A national land policy. There are now millions of acres of free and idle land, controlled by speculators, where new towns and communities could be built. It ought to be one of the priorities of federal government policy to take over these lands from speculators and utilize them in behalf of our national housing emergency.
- A national migration policy. The right of all citizens to move wherever they wish within the society should not be infringed upon. People, after all, are entitled to move to areas which promise them greater opportunities and a better standard of living. What now happens is that the conditions people find in some of the cities to which they move do not match their expectations, thereby making some cities more desirable than others and creating an impossible burden for some. We need, therefore, to eliminate the existing disparities in health and welfare facilities in the different cities—so that all cities will have an equal attraction to those who want to migrate.

One of the ideas proposed to help deal with the urban crisis is that of regional metropolitan planning. Yet there are certain factors in the relationship between counties, cities and states which are inconsistent with the effective operation of regional planning.

There is an enormous number of suburbanites who earn astronomically high salaries in the city, and who daily burden the city's public services and facilities, but pay little or no taxes to the city.

It is the rural and suburban vote in many state legislatures which cuts back on state aid to the cities and which ignores the steadily growing problems in those cities. Further, it is this dominant suburban vote in the state legislatures to which Congress responds when it tries to make an estimate of the problems and requirements of the cities. Since Negroes are scarcely represented in the suburban vote, it means that Congress pays no attention to the needs of Negroes, most of whom now live in the cities.

These facts alone are sufficient to reveal the absurd political position of those Negro militants who claim that the organization of Negro political power in the ghetto is a sufficient means for obtaining the social and economic liberation of the Negro people. The contrary attitude is needed.

We ought to be opening up the suburbs so that Negroes can become a part of that dominant suburban electorate which determines the fate of the cities and the extent of federal allocations. In short, if it is the suburban vote that really counts in the political process by which the problems of the cities are measured and attacked, then the Negro has no choice but to be where that vote is.

No city has enough money and resources to attack its problems all by itself. There are at least two reasons for this. One is that there are too many loopholes in the existing tax structure through which the rich can slip at will. The other is that the migration of big-income families out of the cities is drastically reducing the cities' tax resources. As a consequence, a small prosperous suburb like Great Neck can afford a higher per capita expenditure on education and other facilities than the City of New York.

Obviously, the solution to these and the other massive problems which constitute the crisis of the cities can be achieved only by a program which matches the proportions of the problems. And it is at once an indictment of our large governmental institutions and a credit to the trade union movement that the latter is the only major institution in our society which has an economic program that can match the proportions of the national and urban crises. As we all know, the labor movement is on record as calling for:

- One million public service jobs for persons now unemployed.
- Two and a half million new housing units each year.
- Improved and expanded mass transit.
- Accelerated construction of such public facilities as water supplies, sewage systems, mass transit, schools, hospitals, day-care centers, playgrounds, libraries, museums, clean air and water.
- An expanded Neighborhood Youth Corps.
- Federal subsidy of More Effective Schools and other remedial programs.
- Manpower training that is linked to job placement.
- Restructuring of public welfare assistance.
- Relief of rural poverty, especially in the Southern and Southwestern states.
- Economic planning under federal leadership.

How is a program such as this—which promises fulfillment to trade union, liberal and Negro objectives—to be achieved?

Obviously, if it cannot be achieved without the support and backing of those to whom it means most, then it is imperative that those to whom it means most should form a coalition of political action in its behalf. This, in concrete terms, means a coalition of trade unionists, Negroes, the white poor, the liberal and radical middle class and youth—all working together to form a new democratic and catalytic majority for social change.

The current political campaign gives this potential majority its first chance in four years to work for the election of the kind of liberal Congress which would be favorable to the passage of the massive programs the society needs.

Of course, there is still no consensus among liberals and other groups as to the efficacy of this coalition. But even those who are presently skeptical have no choice but to support those principles, those candidates, and ultimately those programs which the coalition supports—the only programs which have the slightest chance of arresting the drift, frustration, decay and violence of our cities.

RWDSU Record 9/15/68

By LEO WOLFF

For 25 years the 11-story headquarters of District 65, affiliated with the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union, AFL-CIO, in downtown Manhattan, has been a bustling center of trade union activity. You could fight your way into one of its three over-worked elevators and find yourself surrounded by organizers, lawyers, workers from the shops and even employers. Last summer something new was added—the Training Center of the Distributive Trades.

Not only is the bustling increased by District 65's new labor-management administered training program, but there has been something of a change in flavor. Nowadays the elevator is likely to contain a sprinkling of teachers, psychologists, sociologists, language specialists and, of course, the unemployed youngsters from the ghettos for whom this segment of the three-pronged program was conceived.

Approximately 250 young people already have received pre-job training in orientation courses and have been placed in good union jobs. They become eligible for full union membership after 90 days.

For many this was their first employment opportunity. Some came off the relief rolls.

District 65 was born out of the hunger and despair of the Great Depression as a kind of mid-1930's youth movement. A former generation of unemployed youth had taken the best jobs it could find, formed a union to protect the youth and improve their conditions and then, in many cases, they and those who followed them in the union became unhappy because the jobs were limited in opportunity and interest. It is natural that members of the union should feel strong ties of kinship with unemployed youth of today and welcome them in a common effort for self-improvement.

David Livingston, president of District 65, expressed it when he wrote of the trainees:

"These young people felt defeated before they started. Their dead-end was really at the very beginning of the road. Our members can understand this very well. Although we are working, all too many '65ers' are made to feel that their jobs are dead-ends . . . These common feelings lead to natural bonds of sympathy and understanding among youths in poverty and 65ers."

The District 65 training program, in its other two phases, Job Upgrading and Higher Horizon, is designed to break down the dead-end walls for both the unemployed youth and the older members of the union.

In past years, the District 65 Employment Office attempted to make its surplus jobs available to the unemployed through various civic agencies. Results were not encouraging. Many young people were turned away because they could not properly fill out applications. Some failed to get past interviewers when a little coaching might have turned the trick. Others were hired but they had come from backgrounds that left them ill-prepared for a work experience and their jobs were short-lived.

Today the batting average for job applicants is so much higher that the training program is able to place practically 100 per cent of its recruits. Before a trainee tries for a job he has four weeks of general introduction to industry. If there is a need for instruction in basic arithmetic or language the course is somewhat longer.

Trainees receive a stipend of $40 a week while attending classes.

While training they go on field trips to District 65 offices and warehouses and gain information about the various jobs and industries in the union. They have an opportunity to talk about the job with employers and employees, including union stewards. Employers are encouraged to talk about the standards they expect their workers to meet; also job conditions and opportunities for advancement.

Stewards and organizers have the responsibility of seeing that trainees get a fair trial when they are hired. In the shop an older member, or "buddy," is assigned to help them over the rough spots.

New York City's Human Resources Administration granted the Training Center $693,000 for an initial 8-month period beginning with June 1967. It has since provided another $435,000 for the subsequent five months. Union and employers also are responsible for some financial support, but the real importance of their contribution lies in other areas.

District 65 has approximately 1,000 collective bargaining contracts in such industries as major department stores, offices and warehouses of big shoe and apparel chains, direct mail, cosmetics, light manufacturing and wholesale distributors of textiles, dry goods, shoes, garment supplies and other items. A lot of hard application by both labor and management is going into the complex business of weaving this broad variety of human and commercial resources into a comprehensive training program.

It is in the Job Upgrading program that management has shown its greatest interest, thus far, and is making its most important contribution. This is to be expected considering industry's need for better trained and higher skilled workers.

Currently there are Job Upgrading programs in the corrugated industry, direct mail, office and shipping. They represent only a beginning and it might be useful to examine what is happening in the corrugated industry, the most advanced industry in the upgrading program, to get some idea of what will come.

Last January the first 21 members from District 65's corrugated box manufacturing shops received certificates of graduation after they completed the institutional part of the upgrading course. It was an emotion-charged commencement exercise attended by top ranking union leaders, employers and the rank-and-file.

The corrugated program consists of 72 hours of institutional training at the center. Trainees come after a day's work in the shops or, in the case of night workers, before they go to their jobs. This phase is followed by from 160 to 440 hours of on-the-job training at their shops.

By agreement with the labor-management committee, which administers the program, each trainee receives the three-month experience rate for the higher classification for which he is being trained. Trainees are guaranteed uninterrupted employment in that they are not subject to layoff during either the institutional or the on-the-job phases.

Professional experts in the theory and operation of corrugated industry machinery supervise on-the-job training. Upon completion of this phase the trainee is immediately promoted to the higher classification and, as soon as he is placed in the higher skilled job, he receives the six-month experience rate.

Thus training brings a corrugated worker a pay hike of up to 40 cents an hour. For example, a headsetter with six months experience or more training to be a pressman will move from his old rate of $2.60½ to the new rate of $2.98 when he completes the course.

Union representatives on the corrugated upgrading committee are Leslie Roberts, Julio Reyes, Ralph Wilson, Fred Clayton, Gale Rociemski, Ted Barnes and Leonard Southall.

Representing the employers are Jerome Wallerstein of the Metropolitan Container Council, Stanley Winniecoff of Republic Container, Arthur Seward of Standard Corrugated, Harold Kroll of Grand City Container and Larry Ernst of Manufacturer's Corrugated.

Leading the graduation exercises was Mr. Roberts, who noted that Mr. Winniecoff had, among other things, played an effective role in the acquisition of machinery for the upgrading course and saved the program thousands of dollars. Mr. Seward and Mr. Kroll were cited for having Georgia State representative Julian Bond addressed the 688 Conference as one of the guest speakers.

State Rep. Bond Stresses Labor as Key Strength to Right Political Road in '68

Julian Bond, member, House of Representatives, State of Georgia, guest speaker at the Local 688 City-Wide Conference, referred to himself in his opening address as a politician "in a day where there is no candidate to vote for," but later indicated some hope may yet bring about a "new way and put strength in movements that are lagging."

The young, boyish-looking representative, spoke with effectiveness, yet subdued tones. Bond said he came from a section of the country where people are hungry, starving for the very necessities that we take for granted. Among other rights denied his people, Bond cited, "I come from a people who have been in this nation for more than 400 years, working from sun-up to sun-down, fighting for the thing we thought would be important to us."

Though we fought for and gained these things which we thought were important to us Bond said, "we found out later . . . there was no money to pay the bills after we were allowed to eat at the counter . . . no bus fare after we got someplace on a desegrated bus we fought to ride . . . and it made no difference to fight to vote, for there seems hardly anyone to vote for."

Having no jobs after the people have been trained is the real problem Bond stated. "The run of the mill and the right to work and eat are keeping our families hungry and our children naked."

In comparing the rate of employment in relation to whites and blacks in the country today he said, "we are better off today than ever before in this nation, but worse off in relation to income." He declared, there are more minority people working now, "but when we compare our rate of employment, we are worse off now than ever before."

In referring to progress today, Bond claimed, "we are living in a peculiar situation of having more than better and having more than worse." He continued, "We are being denied the most precious rights an oppressed people have ever had before . . . the right to organize."

Labor has been in politics for many, many years in a very successful way, he said. "However, labor has to look at its politics again in 1968. It has to look at the political bosses . . . the kind of boss that starves children and keeps people from voting, tells workingmen they are for them, yet keeps them from working."

The people who represent labor are going to be key decision-makers, he said. The votes are the things you want done, he said, "but what you need and what we need is the right sort of things to be done."

If you think you're going to get this from Mr. Wallace or Mr. Nixon you are dead wrong, he said. Mr. Wallace has never done a humane thing in his entire career, except destroy everything, Bond continued.

In conslusion Bond said, "We are seeking a better life, more jobs and a clearer religious understanding in our nation today. The Statue of Liberty is a known symbol to welcome people coming into our country. To look at her gives one a feeling of security when arriving here . . . a warm feeling. But I would like to think the Statue of Liberty reverses her position sometime and gives that welcome and assurance to my people living here in this country. I would like to think that she says to us, relating to our country, 'Baby, here we are . . . give us your masses as well."

GRAND EXALTED RULER OF ELKS ENDORSES NIXON

Hobson R. Reynolds, Grand Exalted Ruler of the I.B.P.O.E.W. (Elks), has endorsed Republican Richard M. Nixon for President.

In announcing his support, Reynolds said:

"I consider the election of President this year most important for all segments of our population and most especially for the minority groups.

As an interested Negro, I have studied the situation carefully and I have come up with the opinion that for the best interests of our country and all facets of government, Richard M. Nixon is the best person for the office.

I am therefore happy to give him my 100 per cent endorsement and support."

The organization of which Reynolds is the head the largest Negro fraternal organization in the world.

PROMINENT BLACKS ENDORSE NIXON

Dateline: Washington, D. C.

Prominent members of the Negro community in professions ranging from religion to music to community service have endorsed Richard M. Nixon for President.

Though their specific reasons for endorsing Nixon vary, they all agree that he is the best qualified man to be president.

Dr. Russell S. Brown of Chicago, General Secretary for the 3-million member AME Church, said in endorsing Nixon:

"I endorsed and worked for Mr. Nixon the last time he ran for President and I endorse him now because I believe he is best equipped to be our President."

Rhythm and blues singer, Arthur Conley, a 23 year-old performer from Atlanta, specifically recommended the GOP ticket to the nation's 10 million black voters, saying:

"I was very impressed by Mr. Nixon's acceptance speech in Miami Beach. After both conventions were over, I personally checked the records of Mr. Humphrey and Mr. Nixon and decided that the Republican candidate would offer a better future for the black man in America."

The President of the National Association of Colored Women's Clubs, Mrs. Myrtle Ollison of Oklahoma City, made a personal endorsement of Nixon. Her organization is one of the largest Negro Women's organizations in the country.

She said she supports Nixon because she feels as he does that private enterprise must work in the black community to a greater extent than it is now.

Mrs. Ollison also feels strongly that black people must be managers and owners of, as well as workers in, the private enterprise in their own communities, a position Nixon also supports.

Hobson R. Reynolds, the Grand Exalted Ruler of the I.B.P.O.E.W., said he believes this election is important for all segments of the population, but especially for minority groups.

"As an interested Negro, I have studied the situation carefully and I have come up with the opinion that for the best interests of our country and all facets of government, Richard Nixon is the best prepared person for the office.

I am therefore happy to give him my 100 per cent endorsement and support," Reynolds said.

The Elks, which Reynolds heads, is the largest Negro fraternal organization in the world.

The two top leaders of the Universal National Industrial Voters League in New Orleans also endorsed Nixon.

George Clark, Chairman of the organization, and Charles A. Morgan, co-Chairman, both endorsed the Nixon-Agnew ticket.

The League is one of the largest and most powerful political groups in the state.

In making his endorsement, Clark said he supports Nixon because of his 7-point plan "To give the black man a piece of the action."

In Washington, a new group called D. C. Blacks for a 2-Party Voice was formed to develop a power base for the Republican Party in the city in the event Nixon wins.

The group, which has endorsed Nixon, said:

"Not one black man of national stature has enthusiastically or even warmly endorsed Hubert Humphrey, whereas Nixon has been endorsed by Negro leaders among which include Mrs. Myrtle Ollison..."

The new group has about 50 members, and its organizers expect that at least 1,000 persons will have joined it before the election.

LOUISVILLE ATTORNEY ENDORSES GOP TICKET

Dateline: Washington, D. C.

On October 21, 1968, J. Earl Dearing, Negro attorney and local GOP leader of Louisville, Kentucky, endorsed Richard M. Nixon for the Presidency.

Mr. Dearing said:

"There is no question but that Mr. Nixon and Mr. Agnew have favorable civil rights records in the traditional sense of the term. Equally signigicant, if not more important, Mr. Nixon has manifested in public statements a commitment to aid, assist and motivate Negro citizens to greater participation in the economic mainstream of America."

"Recently, Mr. Agnew clarified his hard lines position on the right of protest by stating that the right to dissent and actively demonstrate dissatisfaction within the limits of free speech are guarantees precious to Americans."

"I am convinced that Mr. Nixon and Mr. Agnew will do more to solve the human and economic problems facing our cities than Mr. Humphrey and Mr. Muskie."

"Despite the long period of control of the White house and the Congress by Democrats, the cities of America are still characterized by overcrowded ghettos and abject poverty.

The Democrats have failed. The Democrats do not have the cure for the ills of our cities."

"I give my endorsement to the Nixon-Agnew ticket with the confidence that both men will stand solidly behind equal justice and progress for the people of all race."

Negro leader praises SCME fight against discrimination

By Whitney Young

(Editor's Note: The following article by the director of the National Urban League and a recognized leader of the Negro community, was syndicated by Scripps-Howard newspapers.)

Organized labor has been taking a licking these days. It has been blamed for everything from rising prices to job discrimination. Events like the New York Teachers' strike that aimed at killing community control of the schools haven't helped labor's image among black Americans. But much of the criticism of the labor movement is unfair.

I believe that, when we look at the whole picture, labor is strongly on the side of social justice and equal rights. It performed a great service in pulling the rug out from under George Wallace's attempts to rack up a large blue-collar vote for his message of hate. The AFL-CIO did a wonderful educational job, showing its members the dangers that the Wallace candidacy meant for their jobs and paychecks.

Grape boycott mounted. Organized labor has backed the strike of the California Farm Workers, predominantly Mexican-Americans suffering from the same discrimination blacks know so well. It helped to mount the nationwide boycott of grapes that we all hope will result in a fair union contract for those beleaguered Farm Workers.

Many unions are in the vanguard of fighting for the rights of the black man. It may be unfair to single out only one since there are many whose contributions too often go unnoticed, but the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, AFL-CIO, is doing a yeoman job of organizing underpaid, often unskilled black workers, helping them to win dignity and higher pay.

Its international president, Jerry Wurf, helped to bring about a union contract for the Memphis sanitation workers after the long struggle that tragically cost the life of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

LEAP program cited. The construction trades unions have historically had bad records, freezing black workers out of high-paying jobs. But we shouldn't let the past blind us to some of the progress they're making. In the first six months of this year, minority group apprentices in these unions have nearly doubled in number. More than half of the dramatic increase came through efforts of a joint Urban League-union program called LEAP (Labor Education Advancement Program).

It's just too glib to blindly talk about union discrimination and anti-civil rights activity without taking into account the fact that just the reverse is true for the mainstream of the labor movement.

Of course, much more needs to be done. Negroes have always been among the most loyal unionists, but too many unions have been too slow to give black people their rightful share of power—choice organizing jobs or union leadership posts. And many still have far to go in recruiting black workers for apprenticeship programs and in organizing sweat shops in low-paying industries. All unions ought to be educating their numbers to the dangers of bigotry, and to the fact that racism damages white workers as well as blacks.

Building bridges. But on the whole organized labor is as good a friend of black efforts for equality as exists in our imperfect society. We've got to work closely with those who support us, and keep trying to convince laggard unions that their own self-interest lies in building bridges to the black community.

The anti-union bias that seems to be growing is an indication that labor's gains aren't wholly secure, and that they are vulnerable to anti-union backlash. They need allies, and greater labor involvement in the fight for equal rights is the best way for labor to insure the support of the black community and America's idealistic young people.

Memphis struggle brings SCME Urban League labor honor

New York City

SCME and International President Jerry Wurf received the National Urban League's Equal Opportunity Day award for their part in the successful struggle to bring union recognition—and with it, dignity — to the Public Works employees of Memphis.

The award cited SCME as the union "which has made the most significant contribution to the Urban League's goal of equal opportunity for all Americans."

Wurf, in accepting the award, told the audience of 1,800 that "black people want to be part of the mainstream of America, but they do not want to be patronized. They want equal opportunity for and recognition of their accomplishments."

Born of discrimination. The Urban League, noting that the Memphis strike was born of an act of racial discrimination, said:

"The incident itself was minor, but it symbolized the inferior status in which black city employees had long been held. SCME risked all to win that strike — its power, its prestige and its future in the South. The grievances of a relatively few black workers escaped into a confrontation that ranks Memphis among the great battles in American labor history.

"It was a coalition of the union and the black community that won Local 1733 almost everything it fought for: recognition, a substantial wage increase and a system of seniority that would insure the appointment of black supervisors for the first time—plus human dignity!"

The door was opened. Paul Jennings, president of the International Union of Electrical Workers (IUE), the 1968 recipient of the honor, said SCME's Memphis victory opened the path to unionization of low-paid workers, black and white, throughout the South.

President Lyndon B. Johnson, a surprise guest at the dinner, told an applauding audience that "despite the blind anger of some men and the apathy of others, we shall overcome."

Urban League Executive Director Whitney Young Jr. praised Wurf and SCME for their "leadership in the fight to bring equal opportunity and dignity to black men."

Membership cards for 1969 being mailed to members

Washington

The new 1969 membership cards are being printed. They will be mailed to all SCME members soon.

In the past there were two types of cards—one for those on payroll deduction, another for member who paid their dues in cash. Now there will be one card for all members.

As members are added to the International roster welcoming letters and cards will be mailed. Below is a sample of the new cards.

At 80th Birthday Tribute: AFL-CIO News 5/10/69 Coalition

Labor, Civil Rights Coalition Reaffirms Randolph's Goals

By Saul Miller

New York—The labor-civil rights coalition gave A. Philip Randolph an 80th birthday present—a rededication to his goal of "total liberation" of the American Negro.

The leaders of the coalition turned out 1,500 strong in a vivid demonstration of unity and voiced their determination to carry on the work that Randolph had dedicated his life to.

The entire scope of the labor movement was represented, along with the religious faiths, Negro organizations, government leaders and many others. They crowded the grand ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel to pay tribute to Randolph and add to the coffers of the A. Philip Randolph Educational Fund to finance voter education and registration projects in black communities to strengthen the labor, liberal, Negro alliance.

And at the conclusion they heard Randolph eloquently lay down the principles by which the coalition must continue to be guided:

"We must reject confrontationism, and together reaffirm the necessity for democratic means of political protest.

"We must reject violence and together reaffirm the power and the wisdom of non-violence.

"And we must reject racial separatism and together, with the conviction that one day our nation can cease to be divided within itself, reaffirm our abiding faith in integration."

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, reviewing Randolph's accomplishments and the gains in the trade union movement in the battle against discrimination, declared there is "no room for complacency."

Randolph, he pointed out, in founding the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters in the face of all-out opposition of the Pullman Co., laid down the basic principle that black workers must be organized and become part of organized labor. Randolph's advice to Negro workers to get into the labor movement and win support for the fight against discrimination was critical to strengthening both the Negro and white worker, Meany said.

The American labor movement has responded to Randolph's leadership, sometimes too slowly, Meany added, but it has come a long way and is determined to wipe out the last vestiges of discrimination with renewed emphasis on job upgrading and training.

Randolph is no longer alone in the struggle as he was in the early years, Meany said, and the AFL-CIO and all its affiliates are working to reach all workers at the local level to carry the message of equal rights.

Roy Wilkins, executive director of the NAACP, following the AFL-CIO president, noted that Meany has worked closely with Randolph and has worked effectively in the civil rights movement and that the AFL-CIO has been the bulwark of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights.

Mrs. Martin Luther King, Jr., told the dinner that she had come from Charleston, S.C., where she has been aiding the striking hospital workers and that Charleston has now become a national test of conscience, that the labor civil rights coaltion is a reality here and the battle must be won.

Randolph, she said, had always been a great inspiration to her late husband and a source of encouragement. Randolph gave him advice and counsel, she said, adding, "thank you for myself and Martin Luther King."

Bayard Rustin, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, served as toastmaster and introduced New York Gov. Nelson H. Rockefeller, New York City Mayor John Lindsay, and C. L. Dellums, president of the Sleeping Car Porters succeeding Randolph who retired from the post last year.

Paying tribute also to Randolph were Msgr. Gregory Mooney, for Terence Cardinal Cooke; Dr. John C. Bennett, present, Union Theological Seminary, and Isaiah Minkoff, executive vice chairman, National Community Relations Advisory Council.

The tributes were touching and emotional in spots as speakers recalled earlier days and difficult battles, stressing Randolph's "prophetic vision," his quiet determination, his courage, his inspiration and his lack of personal animosity.

It was all underscored when George Shirley of the Metropolitan Opera sang some of the lyrics of Negro poet Langston Hughes and when "Oh, Freedom" rolled out over the great hall.

In his response, Randolph expressed his gratification at the "fine representation" at the dinner from all areas of American life, cited Rustin's genius for organizing protest marches and spoke of his admiration and affection for Meany as a man who "when he commits himself to a program will work at it and carry it through. He doesn't pretend to be for something when he isn't."

In dedicating himself to the liberation of the Negro, Randolph said, his major endeavor was to establish an alliance between the Negro and the American trade union movement because the Negroes are a working people and the labor movement is the home of the working man and the only haven for the dispossessed.

The struggle of the Negro masses for social and economic equality has "become irrepressible," he observed. But in the continuing struggle "we must have faith that the society, divided by race and class, and subject to profound social pressures, can one day become a nation of equals."

Harlem Youngster Salutes Randolph

New York—The "generation gap" closed on a prolonged wave of applause here when 13-year-old Tom Powell hopped onto a chair to reach the microphones to pay tribute to A. Philip Randolph.

Tom, a member of the A. Philip Randolph Leaders of Tomorrow, a Harlem-based group of youngsters dedicated to carrying on the civil rights struggle, said simply that Randolph was a great man and his group would make sure that his work was carried on.

CLIMAX OF 80TH BIRTHDAY dinner for A. Philip Randolph came when NAACP Exec. Dir. Roy Wilkins paid tribute to Randolph and presented him with a book of letters from American and world leaders. Randolph, noting the numerous tributes and citing his long and close relationship with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, responded with an eloquent plea that the labor-civil rights coalition carry on to win "total liberation" for the American Negro.

Labor Board Ruling Spurs Drive at Georgia Cannery

ZEBULON, Ga.—The NLRB in Washington has upheld Local 315's charges that the Besco Products Co., canners of fruits and vegetables here, engaged in unfair labor practices and refused to bargain in good faith with the union.

Int'l Rep. Guy Dickinson, who filed the charges in February, said he was highly gratified at the NLRB ruling and hoped it would pave the way for the resumption of negotiations for a first contract with Besco.

The Besco Products case, which dates back to last September, presented a number of aspects not usually found in labor disputes nowadays.

On one side was William Edwards, the town's most prominent citizen, who not only owns Besco but also controls a second-hand car lot and a bank. Opposed to him were Negro workers who are employed nine months a year at most, at rates that barely reach the Federal minimum.

On Sept. 5 the workers walked off their jobs in support of a boycott of the town's school system resulting from the hiring of a white principal to replace a Negro who had resigned. Under the direction of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, almost the entire Negro community of Zebulon joined the boycott.

One of the boycott leaders was Robert Curtis, shop chairman at Pomona Products plant in Griffin, 15 miles away, who lives here.

In support of the school boycott, the Besco workers walked out of the plant; soon afterward they got in touch with Curtis and said they wanted to join the RWDSU.

Org. Hershel Holmes, AFL-CIO staffer Jim Freeman, Dickinson and Curtis proceeded to sign up some 200 employees, a large majority of those working at the plant.

After a number of attempts to arrange a meeting with the company failed to get any response, the workers set up picketlines Sept. 9. The company retaliated by releasing its pimento growers from their contracts and later closed down the plant.

Union Responds

The union responded by petitioning the NLRB for a bargaining election.

At a board hearing Sept. 30, the company contended the employees had quit when they struck.

About 25 employees, mostly white, work the entire year, but when the canning season is at its peak, from June to November, the force is expanded to 300 workers, nearly all Negro.

Conditions and wages in the plant are very poor.

Some employees have worked at Besco for 30 years and earn only $1.60 an hour. They don't punch time cards; the supervisor simply jots down what he thinks the worker should be paid. None of them has ever had a paid holiday, a vacation or almost any other benefit.

Some years ago the company was found to have violated the Wage and Hour Law, and the U. S. Dept. of Labor ordered Besco to reimburse the workers for the differences that were uncovered. The company sent out checks, but later coerced the employees into returning them.

A Senate diagnosis of medicare bills

The Senate Finance Committee is about to charge that too many doctors, dentists, optometrists, pharmacists, hospitals, and nursing homes have been playing fast and loose with the government's multibillion-dollar medicare and medicaid programs. The charge will be backed by information collected during an investigation under way since February.

Shock waves from the charge may make it harder than ever for the Nixon Administration to take a thankless decision: to boost the monthly levy on the aged for medicare's medical insurance trust fund. The levy, increased by a stiff 33% only 14 months ago, must be raised again—perhaps to $5—to meet the fund's deepening deficit.

Some of the Finance Committee's findings have already been spelled out by Delaware's hard-bitten Republican John J. Williams, one of the Senate's most tenacious investigators, and by Finance Chairman Russell B. Long, the Louisiana Democrat who is a free-swinging advocate of bigger and better welfare programs.

Bitter pill. They have told the Senate of some startling discoveries:

- ". . . . In 1968, the medicare program paid $25,000 or more to each of at least 5,000 physicians. . . ."
- ". . . . Thousands of health practitioners—doctors, dentists, optometrists, and others—were each paid $25,000 or more under the welfare health programs [medicaid] in 1968. The total number is not yet known. . . ."
- Medicare average payments for "common surgical procedures" run as much as two to four times as high as Blue Shield maximums for the same operation.
- Patients and employees up and down the medicare system are pouring in letters and reports citing specific instances of kickbacks by therapists working with nursing homes; payments for services never rendered; "gang visits" by physicians to 20 to 40 patients at a single time in nursing homes, with each patient billed separately at full fee.

The Finance Committee report, to be released near the end of this month, will wrap up a lot of additional data. Then, says Chairman Long, "I anticipate that the committee will want to begin formal hearings."

Heal thyself. The American Medical Assn. has issued a statement offering to "cooperate with the Finance Committee," saying it "shares" the committee's concern. Several medical societies, AMA said, have expelled members who were found to have charged "excessive" fees or "in some other way exploited the program."

Dr. Gerald Dorman, who becomes AMA president on July 1, said this week that some allegations of overcharging had arisen because "a group filed [bills] under a single doctor's name." He said also that some doctors' fees may have risen sharply if, for example, they formerly had charged older patients only $3 a visit, but now charged their "usual and customary" fee—as specified in the law.

Senator Long pointed out that a physician's name on the $25,000-or-more list "would by no means indicate any wrongdoing or profiteering. He might, for instance, have a large part of his practice consist of medicare or medicaid patients."

Senator John J. Williams

What Long is finding, though, is that loose rules and regulations governing the payout of some $5-billion a year for hospital and doctor bills under medicare "seem to be encouraging some ruthless providers of health services to take advantage of medicare, and of the aged."

Watchdogs. The Senate committee's report will be a prickly present for Social Security Commissioner Robert Ball and other overseers of medicare on the program's third birthday. It will raise sharp questions about the amount of control exercised over the 14 "intermediaries" (mostly Blue Cross associations and insurance companies) who actually pay hospital bills under medicare's Part A, and the 59 "carriers" (mostly insurance companies) who pay doctor bills under Part B, medicare's voluntary supplementary insurance.

The report will list average medicare payments to physicians for eight "most common surgical procedures," and compare them with maximum fees for the same operations under the most widely held Blue Shield contract in the same geographical area. Williams has told the Senate that "medicare's average payment runs as high as two to four times as high as Blue Shield maximums"—and, in two areas, a cataract operation costs medicare "more than four times as much as the Blue Shield allowance," on average.

Fundless fund. Despite what Williams describes as medicare's "pattern of inflated payments," the hospital insurance trust fund (which finances the Part A program from assessments levied on all wage earners) is in good shape. Even so, Health, Education & Welfare Secretary Robert H. Finch—as part of President Nixon's April budget-trimming operation—announced a cut in medicare payments to hospitals.

But the medical insurance trust fund (which collects premiums and pays doctor bills under Part B) is doing poorly. By yearend, Finch must decide how much to raise the monthly premium (and matching contribution from the Treasury) to get the fund back into fiscal trim.

The fund had an accrued deficit of $155-million last January—and is expected to go deeper into the red—partly as a result of a decision taken by Finch's predecessor, Wilbur J. Cohen. Last December, then-Secretary Cohen decided to hold the monthly premium at $4 for Part B's 19-million oldsters. The premium, originally $3, had already been hiked $1 in April, 1968. By keeping it at $4, Cohen had hoped to pressure doctors and medicare carriers to limit their fee increases.

Unions

Coalition talks in GE's future

see over

Employers got another setback this week in their fight against coalition bargaining by unions: The U. S. Court of Appeals in New York upheld a National Labor Relations Board decision that a multiunion bargaining committee may confront management as long as there is no "substantial evidence of ulterior bad faith" and if negotiations are solely in behalf of those under a specific contract.

The ruling was in a case brought by the International Union of Electrical Workers against General Electric Co. But it has implications for all employers who must deal with more than one union. It holds that "cooperation between unions is not improper, up to a point." And it upheld the right of NLRB "in the first instance to determine whether the line has been crossed."

Reaction. Paul Jennings, president of IUE, hailed the ruling as "a landmark decision for real and effective bargaining." The IUE is spearheading a coalition of 10 AFL-CIO unions scheduled to begin formal talks next month with GE and later with Westinghouse Electric. The ruling shores up the labor bargaining strategy, says Jennings, since it "implicitly recognizes the right of unions to meet a company's unified and centralized concentration of its own bargaining." The reference is to GE's bargaining practices covering some 80 unions.

For its part, GE was considering an appeal at midweek, even though the company found "some encouragement" in two points of the court ruling: The three judges held that GE had a right to insist on meeting with a "traditional" IUE-only committee in preliminary discussions before formal talks opened, and the court limited multiunion bargaining to matters that pertain directly to the employees under the IUE contract.

Background. GE may delay a decision until after another federal appeals court rules shortly on a case involving 3M Co. The substantive issues are the same, except for a matter of timing: GE balked at meeting with an IUE committee that included "stranger unionists" in mid-1966, before formal bargaining began, and continued to do so for a short time afterward. But 3M is charged with balking at coalition talks after formal negotiations began.

In a copper industry case, NLRB decided earlier this year that unions may not engage in coalition bargaining if they insist on a common contract expiration date, a settlement to be applied equally to each union and each bargaining unit, and acceptance by the company or industry of a demand that settlements must be reached for all union operations before any agreement can go into effect.

Economics Downgraded:

Coalition's Stress on Esthetics Leaves Basic Needs Unsolved

The following is excerpted from an article by Gus Tyler, assistant president of the ILGWU, in the June 9, 1969, issue of The New Leader. The article, "Coalition of the Comfortable," is one of a series on the outlook for political liberalism.

THE TOPSY-TURVY sociopolitics that transforms the rich into liberals and the workers (especially blue collar) into conservatives, flows from an earlier theory which asserts that the struggle for riches in America has been replaced by a new conflict over spiritual goodies. Before the ADA Roosevelt Day Dinner in January 1967, Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., put it with his usual clarity. "The issues are no longer social and economic so much as they are cultural and moral," declared the distinguished historian and involved liberal. Then he went on to explain why:

"The New Deal program tackled the elemental tasks of the American people—a job, a suit of clothing, three meals a day, a roof over one's head and a measure of security for old age. Because the New Deal secured the basis of life for so many, contemporary liberalism has been able to move on to qualitative tasks—to measures, in other words, designed to improve the quality of life in an industrial society. These are the issues of civil rights, of civil liberties, of education, of urban planning, of the state of the arts and the beauty of the environment."

Schlesinger's historic premise is, of course, both accurate and pertinent. In the mid-30's, one-third the nation was "ill-fed, ill-clothed, and ill-housed." Thanks to the work of Roosevelt and Truman, these traditional "ills" plague only one-eighth the nation. But does this really mean the "issues are no longer economic"?

To begin with, the one-eighth thanks to population growth, is almost as numerous as the old one-third. And because millions of poor have in recent decades moved off the soil into the overpressurized cities, they are more discontented than the oppressed of 30 years ago. On top of that, the woes of the bottom, especially in the cities, are tinged with black and hence doubly incendiary.

But it would be a mistake to assume that the problems of poverty are restricted to the urban Negro. About three out of four of those officially listed as poor are in the "dominant" white community. In New York City (which is not part of Appalachia), white indigents outnumber black by three to two. And the whites who have moved out of poverty, thanks to the New Deal, would now like to live like the affluent—house with a backyard, kids in college, a few extra bucks for that bankrupting hospital bill.

Their expectations—like the expectations of the blacks after the passage of civil rights legislation—have risen. Indeed, in both races the desire is to get the green stuff needed for the good life.

None of this should come as any surprise to liberals—particularly if they come out of the radical tradition. Radicoliberalism was always more than a politicized Lady Bountiful, lifting bums off the floor and forgetting them once they learned how to stand erect.

A progressive movement with long-range social objectives does not count on losing its mass base once the worst is over, it assumes a steady drive until all enjoy both ease and income. Only in this post-economic utopia will men turn their prime attention to "the state of the arts," the "beauty of the environment," and the cultivation of culture.

TO SUGGEST that America has already reached this state of grace is to exaggerate the accomplishments of the New Deal and to understate the plight of some 80 percent of the population. It must be granted, of course, that since the 1930s, a fairly numerous new class of incomed intellectuals has developed, part of which draws spiritual and material sustenance from a primary involvement in the arts, the environment, education, urban planning, and other quality items. In their tight circle, public talk is more about beauty than the buck.

But as vocal and vital as this stratum may be, it is only a slight sliver of the nation. Most people—including the very rich—are profoundly concerned about money and social status that it often confers.

What has happened to some progressive ideologues in the last three decades is that, as they moved from radicalism to liberalism, they moved also from the Marxian to the anti-Marxian view of man. To Marx, man the political animal was, first of all, man the economic being. The new theories rest on man's etherial attributes. Hence, proponents of the "New Politics" end up with "movements" based not on class interest but on the literary inventions of the pundit.

The truth is that in shifting focus from economics to esthetics (though I personally prefer the latter to the former), the basic and burning need to redistribute the wealth of America is forgotten. Yet it is precisely this continuing maldistribution of income and wealth that has weakened the liberal coalition: turning workers against the taxes of the welfare state; poor against near poor; white against black; blacks against one another. To solve all this by substituting esthetics for economics is in effect telling the nation that if it lacks bread it should eat crepe suzettes.

The old coalition did and does make sense, because it rested on an ancient verity: the need to earn a living. The program of this coalition, of course, must be updated; its philosophy needs restating; its organization needs an infusion of new blood.

In that process, the liberal intellectual can play a role.

By Press Associates, Inc.

SINCE MOST AMERICAN citizens rely heavily on the postal service to maintain essential contacts with family, friends and in business, most of us have a vested interest in proposals to replace the Post Office Dept. with an autonomous, self-supporting government corporation.

Pres. Nixon has officially endorsed such an operation.

Most Americans have two basic concerns relative to the postal service: will it be a reliable, efficient service and what will be the cost.

The U.S. postal system has always been a federal service. The Continental Congress established postal services which replaced a colonial system set up by the British prior to the Revolutionary War.

And when the federal union was established a postal service was authorized in the Constitution with the single sentence: "The Congress shall have power . . . to establish post office and post roads."

Behind these actions a fundamental controversy arose: should the post office be a service for the American people or should it be a revenue-making, profit-making enterprise.

Some Federalists, particularly Secretary of the Treasury Alexander Hamilton, conceived that the post office would be a revenue-producing agency which each year would turn over to the Treasury a good proportion of its profits.

The Jeffersonians challenged this view. Their idea of a postal service was that any surplus should be used to extend the service and make it more efficient and better serve the people.

Jefferson and his supporters believed that the more profitable eastern routes would serve to support mail service in the frontier regions.

The postal service also played an important role in our highway system. The Constitution said that it was the federal responsibility to construct post roads. In 1801 there were 20,000 miles of post roads. By 1812 there were some 50,000 miles. It continued to zoom.

Over the years postal subsidies have assisted various forms of transportation—shipping, stage coach, waterways, railroads and airlines.

From the days of Benjamin Franklin, though, the prevailing American concept of a postal system was one which made possible distribution of the printed word, whether it be letter, newspaper, magazine or book. In a free society, it was felt, low-cost communications was essential in uniting the people.

Around the late 1830s the postal service ran into difficulties. It was costly and its efficiency left much to be desired. The railroads started skimming the cream off the top with private service.

THROUGH THE YEARS new services were provided the American people: free city delivery in 1863; special delivery in 1885; rural free delivery in 1896; postal savings in 1911 and air mail in 1918.

First class and later air mail pretty well paid for itself. Some of the other classes of mail—such as newspapers—performed essential services. And certainly business was being subsidized by third class mail.

During this period the Post Office Dept. went deeper and deeper in the hole. The American people were using the services of the department more than ever.

Few question the fact that the Post Office Dept. needs basic reform. Today the service is far below the standards of the past. The question that is facing the American people, though, is whether they should junk the entire system and institute a self-supporting postal corporation. It could well become a costly venture for the American people.

And it comes back to the basic issues fought out by the Jeffersonians and the Hamiltonians—should the postal system be a service for the people or a profit-making venture?

LABOR NEWS CONFERENCE PROGRAM 11, SERIES 9

FOR RELEASE: A.M. PAPERS, WEDNESDAY, JULY 9, 1969

Although politics may be the main thrust of the organized labor-black community coalition in the immediate future, "decent jobs at decent pay" for all workers remains the long-range goal, the AFL-CIO's Director of Civil Rights declared today.

"This is not a power game played in order to divide up the spoils," said Donald Slaiman, but to get legislation and programs to help meet the problems. But, he said, effective operation of programs takes not only "people who will pass the right legislation," but "cooperative work in the community and in the workshop" as well.

Slaiman said that the coalition had "one of the better cooperative working relationships ever in registration and getting out the vote" in the 1968 elections. He said that the percentage of the vote was "higher for COPE-endorsed candidates than it ever was in the black community." As a result of its narrow margin of victory, the new Administration has "moved to the (political) right at a very, very slow pace." Slaiman appeared on LABOR NEWS CONFERENCE, a nationwide radio interview broadcast Tuesday at 7:35 p.m. (EDT), on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

The unionist said that the "overwhelming majority of the Negro community" remains interested in integration and peaceful progress, and "is not moving toward separatism and nationalism." But, he cautioned, the civil rights movement and the labor movement -- as well as the militants -- know that"just ending discrimination will not solve the problems of poverty and deprivation, nor even the problems of integration."

"Unless we break up and disperse the ghettos," he said, "we not only will have an intensified apartheid in our major cities, but we will also have a deterioration of the hubs of our total society." And if that happens, he warned, "not only will the Negro youth be lost, but the country will be lost."

Slaiman said that integration of apprenticeship programs is a "very rapidly improving picture," noting that since 1960, the level of black apprentices in registered apprenticeships has nearly tripled. That, he said, is a "more rapid increase on minority participation and a higher absolute percentage than in almost any well-paid part of the labor force throughout the country."

Reporters questioning Slaiman were Frank Swoboda, Washington correspondent for United Press International, and Harry Conn, editor of Press Associates, Incorporated.

PROGRAM 11, SERIES 9

SUBJECT : Labor -- Black Community Coalition

GUEST : Donald Slaiman, director of the Civil Rights Department, AFL-CIO

REPORTERS: Frank Swoboda, labor correspondent, United Press International Harry Conn, editor of Press Associates, Incorporated

MODERATOR: Frank Harden

HARDEN: LABOR NEWS CONFERENCE. Welcome to another edition of LABOR NEWS CONFERENCE, a public affairs program brought to you by the AFL-CIO. LABOR NEWS CONFERENCE brings together leading AFL-CIO representatives and ranking members of the press. Today's guest is Donald Slaiman, director of the AFL-CIO's Department of Civil Rights.

The long-standing coalition between organized labor and the black community has been a key factor in molding much of the nation's social and economic progress in recent decades. Here to question Mr. Slaiman about the factors leading to the formation of that coalition, how it functions today and what role he thinks it will play in the years ahead, are Frank Swoboda, labor correspondent for United Press International, and Harry Conn, editor of Press Associates, Incorporated. Your moderator, Frank Harden.

And now, Mr. Conn, I believe you have the first question?

CONN: Thank you, Mr. Harden.

Mr. Slaiman, perhaps the civil rights movement has been pushed off the front pages in recent years by the rush of militant events around the country, but, is there a civil rights movement in operation?

SLAIMAN: Very definitely. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is still the largest mass organization.

It has more than 1,500 branches.

It has the chief civil rights lobbyist in the country, Clarence Mitchell.

And, it has on-going influence that doesn't always hit the front pages of the newspapers and television news, because it's not news unless it's dramatic and negative, these days.

CONN: Would you say that the NAACP is the single most influential organization pushing for civil rights today?

SLAIMAN: Yes. Without question.

SWOBODA: Mr. Slaiman, what has been the effect of the black militant movement on the NAACP and on the whole national effort?

SLAIMAN: Well, I think there is a very mixed effect.

The rise of militancy, especially in the very early days of the direct action movement, did a lot of shaking up -- thawed some glaciers.

In more recent times, the effect tends to be more negative, divisive and confusing. These days, unless you identify the speaker, you sometimes can't tell which side he is on. This can be very harmful.

In addition, some of the militant activity has intensified the backlash of people who were already moving toward accepting integration.

However, the fact that there is a good deal of obvious discontent -- that there are obvious problems that people are reacting to -- is not all negative, because complacency is also a big danger.

CONN: Mr. Slaiman, as Mr. Harden noted, there is this working relationship between the civil rights movement and the AFL-CIO. What are you doing in this working relationship?

SLAIMAN: Well, look at the last election -- the last Presidential election -- 1968. It appeared for a while that the old coalition was disintegrating. The liberals -- many of them -- were off in the one-issue area. Many blacks were getting publicity by saying, don't vote -- it doesn't make any difference -- go fishing -- or vote for some splinter candidate like Dick Gregory or Eldridge Cleaver. Yet, we probably had one of the better cooperative working relationships ever in registration and getting out the vote, through the A. Philip Randolph Institute's activities with Negro trade unionists, with the NAACP and other civil rights groups.

The precentage of the vote -- in spite of all the agitation and in spite of all the negative publicity -- was as high or higher for COPE-endorsed candidates than it ever was in the black community. The result was, against great odds, we almost won the election with that old coalition of Negroes, and Mexican-Americans, and old people, and youth, and labor, and liberals.

We almost put together a winning combination.

CONN: Are some examples of this coalition in some of these mayoral races? I'm thinking of how close Bradley came to winning in Los Angeles -- something like 46 or 47 percent of the votes And there was Charles Evers' victory in Mississippi -- Mayor Stokes' in Cleveland -- Mayor Hatcher's in Gary, Indiana. Are these all products of the coalition?

SLAIMAN: They are not exactly alike.

Bradley is the clearest example of what you are talking about, Mr. Conn. There was a liberal -- Negro -- Mexican-American -- labor coalition, with some enlightened businessmen and other people of good will voting far stronger for Bradley than they did a few earlier on the fair housing referendum -- far, far higher.

So, although Bradley didn't win, there is no doubt that with only a very small percentage of the vote being Negro -- some 17 or 19 percent--

Bradley got a big percentage of the white vote.

SWOBODA: Mr. Slaiman, you said that the coalition worked so well in the 1968 election that it almost won. But, it didn't win. As a result, we have a new Administration. What has been the impact of this Administration on the civil rights movement?

SLAIMAN: Well, although we didn't win, we almost won. For that reason, the Administration has moved to the right at a very, very slow pace. In fact, the biggest criticism one can have is, it doesn't move at all-- not that it has moved so sharply to the right. Although it has made some hesitant steps here and there to accommodate Senator Strom Thurmond, (R-S.C), he has never really arrived. That is, the pressure of public opinion, the coalition and the fact that the country really didn't move sharply to the right, has maintained, if not a sharp move forward, at least some forward momentum toward implementing civil rights laws as well as maintaining them.

SWOBODA: Do you think the labor-black coalition can keep this pressure going for the next four years?

SLAIMAN: Well, I can't predict that we will be totally successful, but I think we will keep the pressure going.

Clarence Mitchell said at the recent AFL-CIO Community Services Conference, that we should "welcome the support and cooperation of church groups, and business associations, and other constructive organizations. However we must never forget that we -- that is, labor and the civil rights community -- are the foundation upon which the house of freedom is built. If we crumble and fall apart, the whole structure may well collapse."

So, while I can't predict success, I can agree with Mr. Mitchell, that if we don't at least partially succeed, freedom in this country will be jeopardized.

CONN: Mr. Slaiman, I think there is a question on a lot of peoples' minds as to exactly what direction most of the black population is directing itself. Is it directing itself to the established approach of fighting discrimination -- working for peaceful integrated communities? Or, is the great bulk of the Negro population moving toward separatism, black nationalism, and black militance?

SLAIMAN: Well I would say that the overwhelming majority of the Negro community is not moving toward separatism and nationalism. I would say that most are still interested in integration and peaceful progress.

But, the problem is a little more complicated than just maintaining a push toward integration and ending discrimination.

Not only the militants who are frustrated realize that this isn't enough. The civil rights movement, as well as the labor movement, is also aware that just ending discrimination will not solve the problems of poverty and deprivation, nor even the problems of integration.

As Bayard Rustin said, just after the Civil Rights Bill was signed that unless the Negroes in coalition with labor and other groups, move toward solving the basic economic and educational problems of this country -- on the political scene, primarily -- we would enter a period of frustration and turmoil.

And I think he was right.

The problem of reaching the goals of the integration movement -- that is, equality, not only on paper, but in reality -- is much more complex than just eliminating discrimination. To the degree that we do not see results of progress -- where we see an intensification of housing problems in the ghettos -- we see the high rate of unemployment among Negro youth even after we have a federal Fair Employment Practices law -- this frustration leads to the troubles -- the riots -- the tendency towards separatism. But, it also means that unless we solve these basic problems, we aren't doing what we thought we would be doing when we started down the civil rights path.

CONN: Well, what you are saying then, is that unless the Negro youth finds a job -- finds a place in the community -- and has some hope of being able to raise a family -- has a home and is able to live the type of life that most all of us what to live -- that unless he has some hope of doing this, we are going to lose him as part of the basic American community.

SLAIMAN: I would say so. But, even more important than that. Unless we break up and disperse the ghettos, we not only will have an intensified apartheid in our major cities, we will also have a deterioration of the hubs of our total society.

We are an increasingly urban civilization. If that urbanized civilization -- that is, its centers -- are nothing but deteriorating segregated ghettos, it's not only the Negro youth who will be lost, but the country will be lost.

I think that we have as big a problem with white middle-class youth in our colleges as we have with Negro youth in the ghettos, if not bigger.

SWOBODA: Mr. Slaiman, you talk about the main thrust being politics. Is this what you see as the main thrust of the labor-black coalition in the immediate future -- the work of the political system to bring about these changes? Or, are there other programs -- other involvements?

SLAIMAN: The main thrust starts with politics, but that is not an end in itself.

This is not a power game played in order to divide up the spoils -- divide up jobs.

The purpose of politics is to get programs and legislation that will do something about the problems.

In the area of jobs, our first priority is the O'Hara Bill, to assure that the government will be the employer of last resort -- that people who can work, even if they don't have the education, will get decent jobs at decent pay, as a starter.

Of course, just passing legislation is not the solution -- this isn't the early New Deal. We have to put the programs into operation at the grass-roots level -- at the local level -- at the state level. This requires not only a coalition to elect people who will pass the right legislation, but it also takes cooperative work in the community and in the workshop, seeing to it that the good laws that are passed attain the goals for which they were intended.

CONN: Mr. Slaiman, if there is one thing that the labor movement knows, it is jobs. Of course, that is crucial in this whole picture. What, specifically, is the AFL-CIO and its affiliated unions doing now to bring about equal opportunity for jobs among all people?

SLAIMAN: Well, there are several areas. They are all important.

One is legislation, both on the anti-discrimination front and on the job-creation front.

Two, programs to implement these laws. Here again, we have an on-going program to involve our affiliates in ending discrimination within their own locals and resolve complaints on a constructive basis.

We also have the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute, which is putting manpower specialists to work at the local level in a number of programs. They are cooperating with those companies that are hiring the hard-core unemployed, and developing buddy systems to see that our locals cooperate and that our members don't backlash to the hiring of what are generally under-qualified minority group workers.

This is a new program, Mr. Conn. We already have recruited a national staff and 50 field staff -- that is, in 50 major cities there are now Human Resources Development Institute field representatives working with the central bodies, with the National Alliance of Businessmen, and with local unions, helping them develop buddy systems. In the future, these men and women will be working with other manpower programs, many of them union-instituted manpower programs -- in construction and other industries.

Beyond what the employers do, the unions are developing their own manpower programs to up-grade the skills, as well as find job opportunities for minority-group youth and for older workers.

SWOBODA: Mr. Slaiman, I don't think there is any doubt about the attitude and actions of the AFL-CIO and the civil rights movement at the top. What about the rank-and-file? How is the acceptance of these programs at that level?

SLAIMAN: Well, when you say the rank-and-file, you are talking about 14 million people. There is no monolithic rank-and-file.

We have every range of opinion within our membership. You really have to talk about how various levels of the labor movement are reacting to various programs.

If you start politically, we find that there was an alarming percentage -- not as big as many people thought -- but to us an alarming percentage of our rank-and-file reacting to Wallace's siren calls. By election time, we had reduced that percentage quite significantly. Our rank-and-file, I would say overwhelmingly -- 60% to 70% -- supports the candidates and the general programs of the labor movement. But, that other 30 to 35 percent is a large group to work on. As you go up the ranks of our leadership, you get a higher and higher percentage identifying with the objectives of the national labor movement. But it is not monolithic -- it is just a higher percentage.

So, when we talk of implementing a program, or educating our people about a program, we start from the position that we have to increase support for the labor movement's objectives. Sometimes we have to be strenuous, otherwise, it can seriously damage our impact. At other times, we just keep doing it to make progress.

We are never in a position to be complacent -- sure that everything is going to turn out alright, because our members are wonderful people.

They are human beings -- they are American citizens -- they need to know the issues -- they need some leadership -- and they need an opportunity to participate with and become part of leadership in the community.

CONN: Mr. Slaiman, there have been some very confusing statistics abroad in recent years as to the amount of integration in apprenticeship training programs. Many people try to use this as a barometer of how much, particularly the crafts, are integrating. From the information you have, what is the picture?

SLAIMAN: It is a very rapidly improving picture.

In 1960, the statistics showed that of registered apprenticeships, slightly more than two percent were non-white. As of the end of 1968, the figure had risen to 7.2 percent -- that's about triple.

Another figure that the Labor Department released shows that in the first half of 1968, 9.4 percent of the entrants were non-white. That means that although we haven't reached an average of the percentage of the population in this most difficult skilled-level -- where there was, in many of the programs, very little minority participation -- we have seen a more rapid increase in minority participation and a higher absolute percentage than in almost any well-paid part of the labor force throughout the country.

Now, this isn't the end of the road. We still have a long way to go.

But, if people want to measure the labor movement's intentions and results by looking at apprenticeships, I think the record in the last few years has been excellent.

SWOBODA: Mr. Slaiman, do you think the economic realities of such programs as Model Cities will speed this even further?

SLAIMAN: If the money that has been talked about is invested and we can get the follow-up on the kind of solid programs that the construction unions have endorsed in principle, I think it will.

But, there are a couple of "if's."

So far, very little actual money is going into construction programs in Model Cities. We have only the pilot programs in which to show results.

SWOBODA: Do you hold out any hope that you will get that money?

SLAIMAN: That is a political problem -- with an Administration that holds the strings and a public attitude that affects what they do.

CONN: Mr. Slaiman, is a key part of this apprenticeship training pre-apprenticeships for those who just can't measure up to the what it takes to enter an apprenticeship -- prior training to enable them to meet the standards?

SLAIMAN: Yes. There is a need for compensatory preparation to make up for education gaps and access gaps.

CONN: And this has accounted for the difference?

SLAIMAN: I think that in large measure, it has. Yes.

HARDEN: Thank you, gentlemen, Today's LABOR NEWS CONFERENCE guest was Donald Slaiman, director of the AFL-CIO's Department of Civil Rights. Representing the press were Harry Conn, editor of Press Associates, Incorporated, and Frank Swoboda, labor correspondent for United Press International. This is your moderator, Frank Harden, inviting you to listen again next week. LABOR NEWS CONFERENCE is a public affairs production of the AFL-CIO, produced in cooperation with the Mutual Broadcasting System.

SUBJECT: November meeting of the Coalition...

Since we did not meet in October and because we are hoping to go over the procedures for the monitoring project, I would like to suggest a two day meeting of the Coalition in November. I am suggesting a meeting starting on Sunday afternoon the 14th of November and adjourning no later than five o'clock on Monday afternoon the 15th.

Will you please let Oleta Fitzgerald, in our office, know if these are convenient dates? If they are not, please suggest other dates in November that would be convenient. We will let you know the final dates and where in Atlanta the meeting will be held, as soon as we have heard from everyone.

PRESIDENT MEANY, Lane Kirkland, members of the Executive Council, brothers and sisters, and particular greetings to our guests from overseas. I am going to deal this morning with a very difficult, trying and agonizing problem which is facing America, that is the problem of justice for all of our citizens, regardless of color, race or creed.

Now, friends, if anything decent is going to happen in these United States, as has been the case since the time of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, it will be because the trade union movement and the black people of this country do not permit themselves to become divided but stick together.

My friends, alliances are not made in the way in which one marries his wife; alliances are not made out of affection; alliances are made out of mutual interest and, although there will be difficult times for us, we must remember that this mutual interest does in fact exist and we must hold on to it.

Let me salute the AFL-CIO for the work it has done for the sanitation workers in Memphis, for the farm workers in Delano, and for the hospital workers in South Carolina. That let no man say that together we are not fighting poverty, for that is precisely what we are doing, more effectively than any other combination of forces.

I note also, and I hope the Wall Street Journal will take note and the New York Times will take note, that there was a magnificent march in Raleigh, North Carolina, a few weeks ago, with 12,000 men and women, white and black, demonstrating in solidarity, and that was organized by the North Carolina AFL-CIO and the Building and Construction Trades Council. There was unity there and, therefore, half of you don't even know about it because the press does not like unity. It records only discord and ugliness.

My friends, I did not come here to make a congratulatory speech. I came here to talk to you about what I consider to be two of the most serious problems this nation faces. We are in a difficult period and I think that you know this better than I do, for you are working daily with the people in the streets, in your neighborhood, and your factories and shops. Therefore, you know more about it than the journalists and the television commentators and the politicians.

What is the difficulty? It is called by many names, but the reality is there has been so little done to meet the needs of the American people that we have cropped up with twin evils, and I want to say a word about these evils.

Black Rage, White Fear Collide

One of them is black rage and the other one is white fear. We hear all about black rage and riots but the newspapers are not telling us about the fantastic fear of many white people, a justified fear in many respects.

These two things feed on each other and they set this nation on a collision course. I believe there are people in this country who want us to be on a collision course. First there is a small handful who want this collision because they see it as the first act of a revolutionary drama of their fantasies. But they are small and sick and a sorry lot with an inflated notion of their strength which comes from seeing themselves too often on television.

BAYARD RUSTIN SAYS

"To Stalling

What is the difficulty? It is called by many names, but the reality is there has been so little done to meet the needs of the American people that we have cropped up with twin evils, and I want to say a word about these evils.

Black Rage, White Fear Collide

One of them is black rage and the other one is white fear. We hear all about black rage and riots but the newspapers are not telling us about the fantastic fear of many white people, a justified fear in many respects.

These two things feed on each other and they set this nation on a collision course. I believe there are people in this country who want us to be on a collision course. First there is a small handful who want this collision because they see it as the first act of a revolutionary drama of their fantasies. But they are small and sick and a sorry lot with an inflated notion of their strength which comes from seeing themselves too often on television.

But there are more powerful lots. They are not the Left but the Right. This group knows that revolution by fanatics will not succeed, but they would use this threat as a pretext for an assault—and do not misunderstand me—not only on black people but first of all on the trade union movement, on social legislation, on civil liberties, and on black people, and they will work hard at it. They would seize on the fear of the future to draw us back into the past. If they succeed then the American dream will be shattered.

My friends, this need not happen. We can get off this collision course, and to do that we must understand what makes for black fear and rage and what makes for white fear.

There are those who say black people have made no progress, we have won no gains in the last decade. But they don't know what they are talking about. Of course we have made much progress. Our long struggle has not been for nothing. The problem that we face is that progress is relative, as every trade unionist knows.

For example, I could say that across the country union wages last year rose 5, 6, 7 or 8 per cent, or what have you, but every trade unionist knows that these are related to prices and you know that many of your workers have been robbed of this net gain by spiraling prices. Therefore, they are resentful, they are afraid, and they are angry.

Despite this progress that black people have made, there are also many parts of our ghettos in which unemployment is double, and there are more rats and roaches in the slums than ever before, in which, 15 years after the Supreme Court decision, there are more Negro children in segregated schools than there were before that decision.

Segregated Education is Inferior

And no matter what some black militants and white intellectuals say, the fact is that segregated education is inferior education and we must not permit anyone to say differently.

My friends, there is another misery. It has nothing to do with black people but with white people. And that is that they are up to here in mortgages. They own homes which are not paid for; they do not have enough money to feed their families; therefore these white people have as much fear because they are afraid of losing what they have, as black

Canadian Likes 'Record' Coverage of Labor Scene

To the Editor:

I am writing to you and your fellow workers to tell you how much I enjoy our union paper, the RWDSU Record.

I find that of all the labor papers and magazines, The Record is by far the best, both in the U.S.A. and Canada. It has articles that are very good for all members of a family. It covers the whole North American continent very well, and it is good to know how other members of the RWDSU are getting along.

Your paper did a very good article on the strike at Sobey's at St. John, N. B. by Local 1065 and on Ed Schreyer's NDP winning the election in the province of Manitoba. I am a member of the NDP myself and I believe that this is the only party for the people of labor in Canada. The only way for the people to defeat the high profit system is through their trade unions, and the union papers, like The Record, are doing their share in defeating this system.

Again, I would like to say how much I enjoy your paper and think it is the best of all labor papers.

Questions

What happens when a campaign speech
Turns out to be a loss?
When men that are elected
Just can not come across!
What happens to the promises
To bring us peace at last?
While many men are dying,
We're going nowhere fast!
What happens to a country
That does not take a stand,
Where violence and corruption
Is getting out of hand!

The Wonder of Life

The wonder of life is all around,
From country village to teeming town.
You don't need glory, power or pelf,
Just faith in God, and in one's self.

A friend to tell one's troubles to.
To see—to feel—to think—to share—
That's life fulfilled, beyond compare.

The Saga of the Mets

From Baltimore the mighty Orioles came To play the lowly Mets a Series baseball game;
The Orioles had strength and skill supreme Far mightier than this very young Met team;
Of two games played, each could count
a win
But Baltimore was laughing—and no
Met wore a grin;
The Birds had Robinson, Powell and Weaver at the head,
Cuellar and McNally, who'd leave the Mets for dead;
What hath our Mets, the meek and lowly Mets
To face these mighty giants, so favored in all bets?
They had Jones and Agee in the field,
and Seaver on the mound,
And Grote, Charles and Harrelson, so nice to have around;
They had Koosman and Swoboda, and Hodges hard to rhyme
And others whose great spirit helped out 'most every time;
They beat the mighty Birds, just scan the final score
And sent them back to Balti- less, and not to Balti- more.

people have rage because they do not have what they feel they should have.

For millions of these white people their jobs and their homes are all they have got. Because their position is so dangerous they feel threatened by the demands of black people for justice because, they argue: "This nation says we will not have enough houses. Therefore, I fearfully cling to mine lest my black brother get it. This nation says there will not be enough jobs. Therefore, I nervously cling to my job lest my black brother get it."

The only answer to that is adequate housing, adequate jobs, adequate education for all. Then white fear and black rage can be contained.

'Let Us Build'

I propose that we tear down all that is dying and dead, all that is ugly and divisive, all that breeds hate and misery, and I propose that we put new towns and cities in their place, new schools in their place, new neighborhoods in their place, fresh air and clean water. I say, friends, let us build.

But the minute I use the word "build," I get right into the middle of a problem which is on all of our minds and which none of us can sweep under a rug. My friends, to use the word "build" brings a subject to the foreground which has caused much controversy and intensely strong feelings. I refer, of course, to the events that have recently occurred in Pittsburgh, Chicago, and other cities, about which I would now like to have a word and would like to have you listen carefully.

The problem raised by these events, the problem of minority participation in the building trades is difficult and dangerous, but let those of you who are in the trade union movement not mistake the problem. It is not the problem of the building trades. It is the problem of all organized labor that to this date, while we have done much, none of us has done enough to completely solve the problem, and we cannot make a scapegoat of any segment of the trade union movement, of any segment of the civil rights movement. This is a fight we are all in together and nothing can be done without the cooperation of all.

There is no doubt in my mind that the events of Chicago and Pittsburgh are a source of tremendous satisfaction to the powerful enemies of the black movement and the labor movement. Read, for example, what was written in last Friday's Wall Street Journal:

"It is no accident that the civil rights groups have chosen this particular time to press their attack on the building trades. They clearly are betting that contractors beset by spiraling wage costs and the public in general will be sympathetic to demands for expansion of union hiring and training efforts in the hope that it might slow inflation in construction by increasing the supply of workers."

You and I understand perfectly well what is meant by that delicate and articulate little language— "slow inflation in construction by increasing the supply of workers." Baby, that simply means, let's cut some wages, let's use the building trades to do it, and let's aggravate the Negro to attack them in order to achieve that little bit.

I do not for one minute believe that a single civil rights group would want to take such a position, for we know that it is pointless and self-defeating to get more Negroes into the industries which are skilled jobs and well-paying, only to have the wages in that industry decline. What the hell you want in for then, only to have the wages drop?

After all, one of the main reasons why black workers are now attracted to these jobs is because the pay and the benefits are the best. They didn't get that way because contractors did it, as the Wall Street Journal would have us believe, or because the public in general somehow uplifted the building trades. It got that way because the building trades fought hard to make it so.

So I want to say a word to my fellow freedom-fighters in the civil rights movement. We must continue to press vigorously for greater minority participation in the building trades. We will not let ourselves become stooges for those powerful economic interests that would use our struggle to depress wages and standards, or to cripple the union that won them.

We black Americans have struggled too hard, come too far and learned too much. We are not dumb 'niggers' now sitting on a cotton bale playing the guitar. We have learned too much to be exploited ever again by the capitalist classes of this country.

There is a great Negro spiritual which says, "No more auction block for me," and along with Brother Randolph I say, "No more union busting, either."

Qualified Apprentices Can Be Found

We know that it is possible to find and train qualified young Negroes and other minority youth to become apprentices. We have done it, and we have done it with the help of the AFL-CIO and the building trades themselves.

What we are saying is we need to do a hell of a lot more of it.

We must do it in ways that do not require the lowering of standards or wages. We do not want to throw out standards. Furthermore, no black boys that I know want to be called black carpenters or Negro plumbers who have lower skills and get less pay. They want to be called carpenters and plumbers. We want them to have the same skills, the same training and the same wages as everybody else, and we will not permit the Federal Government and its Labor Department to impose on the trade union movement in America a second-class citizenship worker in this nation.

The only organization which has a total program for the eradication of poverty, for the eradication of racism which springs from poverty, is the economic and social program of the AFL-CIO.

In short, we must rebuild America if we are to have justice for black brothers are to be brought in. The program of the AFL-CIO is that. gress for black people. We must have plenty and not scarcity if my black brothers are to be brought in. The program of the AFL-CIO is that.

I believe that of all the mass institutions in America, only the labor movement has the answer to these basic questions because they are economic and these are the key questions which will affect all Americans. They are the key questions which must profoundly affect black Americans. These are the relevant questions; these are the questions which can remove, at the same time, white fear and black rage.

I am going to do what Phil Randolph taught me I had better do. I am sticking with the Union.

Gardner's 'Temperamental Imperative'

Urban Coalition

By DAVID C. ANDERSON

When John Gardner, the former Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare and current chairman of the Urban Coalition, recently announced a plan to launch a broad based "citizens lobby" to press for reform of social and political institutions, response from the press was hardly enthusiastic.

In major newspapers, stories about the project, to be known as "Common Cause," were stashed deep in the inside pages. When Mr. Gardner went on "Face the Nation," cynical interviewers tried to get him to say that he is actually trying to get himself elected President by setting up what looks like a fourth party. And when a reporter mentioned his interest in the subject to a Washington-wise colleague, he drew a testy response: "You'll find there's not much substance to what he has in mind; so far as I can tell, it's nothing but a jellyfish."

Disheartening Thoughts

An hour or so spent discussing the plan with Mr. Gardner is enough to persuade a skeptical interviewer that Common Cause is, in concept at least, something more than a jellyfish, and probably deserving of more attention than it has received. At the same time, the discussion leads to some disheartening thoughts about the problem of social change in America.

Admittedly, there is a certain vagueness to Mr. Gardner's plan, which he describes as a lobbying organization to engage in letter writing campaigns and other still undeveloped programs aimed at the somewhat fuzzy goal of institutional reform. The group's efforts would presumably involve such public issues as crime, racial tension, poverty and ending the Vietnam war.

Mr. Gardner contends the need for a group like Common Cause arises from what he sees as the widespread failure of government at all levels to solve problems. "Almost everywhere you touch the public process in this country, you find a failure of performances," he says.

Indeed, he explains, American society seems to suffer generally from a widespread case of institutional decay. Such a "phase of diminished vitality" in social and governmental institutions is hardly a new development, Mr. Gardner says, adding that for the past two decades his career has led him to think about the process of decline and renewal in social institutions.

Such a situation is hardly hopeless, however, Mr. Gardner contends. Indeed, if history has shown that institutions decay nearly inevitably, it has also shown that they can renew themselves. "The disease is curable," he asserts. Furthermore, he believes, it may be possible for enlightened people in a modern democratic society to set in motion such a process of renewal. This, he says, is what Common Cause is all about.

The reform of institutional structure, he contends, is largely impeded by the fact that no pressure group exists to make the case for such general reform to the public and to support public officials who try to enact it.

For, he explains, inefficient institutions have a way of protecting themselves, even to the point of their collapse. "Almost everyone in the system is a prisoner of it," Mr. Gardner says. "I've been thinking about the decay of human institutions for nearly 20 years now, but when I was Secretary of HEW, I thought less about the subject than at any time before or afterward. I was a player in the game, then, and I had to work according to the rules."

"Every modern President has had a backlog of reorganization and reform proposals on his desk," he goes on, "but he's always faced a hornets' nest of opposition in trying to implement them, and he's never had any backing for implementation."

Both the publicity and the popular support necessary to the success of reform efforts, Mr. Gardner believes, might be created by establishment of an "outside constituency," a pressure group with no special interest but the better functioning of the system as a whole.

Mr. Gardner readily concedes that the reform of social and political institutions still is not a subject likely to generate massive popular feeling. But he points out that a relatively small group with an idea whose time may be coming can have great influence. "It doesn't need to be an enormous number," he says. For the United States, "a million people are enough."

And he firmly believes at least this many can be reached. "In every field of special interest there is a percentage of people who understand that if the nation fails, their special interest fails too. You find this at all levels; in unions, in minority communities, as well as in the professions. I don't think of it in liberal-conservative terms so much as in practical terms. These are the people who want to get going and solve our problems."

Mr. Gardner emphasizes that he senses in the nation a depth of such concern that goes beyond empty idealistic posturing. "There is a restlessness over this," he says of the disillusionment with government. "For many people," acting on the feeling that something needs to be done about government failures "is not only moral, but a temperamental imperative."

To gather support, Common Cause recently sent out a test mailing of 200,000 letters to citizens of all social levels in all parts of the country. "Most parts of the system have grown so rigid that they cannot respond to impending disaster," the letter says. "They are so ill designed for contemporary purposes that they waste taxpayers' money, mangle good programs and frustrate every good man who enters the system."

The letter warns that "no particular interest group can prosper for long if the nation is disintegrating. Every group must have an overriding interest in the well being of the whole society." And it calls for an "active, powerful, hard-hitting constituency" to fight for reforms necessary to protect that interest. The letter asks an enrollment fee of $15.

Though it's too early to gauge response to the mailing, Mr. Gardner's associates say they have been pleased with the popular response to initial publicity for Common Cause. One Gardner spokesman reports that his office currently is receiving about 200 letters a day from people wanting more information about Common Cause. "And it's a fascinating mix of mail," he says. "It isn't predominantly professional or intellectual as you might expect," he says. Rather, the letters seem to come mainly from middle class people in all parts of the country.

If this looks encouraging, the project as outlined by Mr. Gardner still leaves room for at least three questions.

First, if the feeling of restlessness for constructive change may exist in some quarters, there is also much popular feeling in the country that would tend to undermine attempts to organize a broad citizens' lobby for the general goal of institutional reform.

Mr. Gardner says the polls show a rising number of people who shun affiliation with traditional political parties. He also says there are statistics to show a surprisingly widespread degree of public agreement in desires for certain changes in areas like housing, employment, education and the administration of justice. Thus, he suggests, Common Cause might be able to link its non-aligned "outside constituency" stance to plans for improvement in these substantive areas, developing political muscle for the overall purpose of institutional reform in the process.

But if there are areas of unanimity, there are also great areas of division. The conflicts between black and white, between people alienated from American life and people defensive about it, and between old and young, are growing more virulent as the months pass, and they may not be separable from the substantive issues Mr. Gardner cites as grounds for new unity. For example, it's hard to see how destructive divisiveness over racial integration could be kept apart from any Common Cause-backed scheme to do something about the shortage of middle-income housing, however widely the housing may be desired.

Second, the fact that the need for institutional reform is real and even widely perceived does not necessarily mean that reform on any meaningful scale may be easily generated or controlled.

Catching the Mood

Mr. Gardner speaks hopefully of the fact that relatively small groups advocating such causes as family planning and environmental conservation have come to have tremendous impact on government policy and on all of society in recent years because they happened to catch a receptive public mood.

But he also admits that historically the process of institutional decay and renewal has not been affected much by rational human activity. Rather, major institutional reforms have usually been forced by such events as wars, plagues or other catastrophes. And his assertion that "we need to produce renewal short of such disasters" seems as obviously lame for any practical purpose as it is obviously true.

Third, even if institutional reform could be realized, there is some reason to question whether the rather diffuse notion of institutional decay is as basic a source of American troubles as Mr. Gardner and many others like to think it is.

There can be no question that institutions of government often seem unresponsive and inefficient, and that there is room not only to improve specific governmental mechanisms but also, as Mr. Gardner suggests, to encourage the feeling both in and out of government that social institutions should continually renew themselves to keep abreast of change.

At the same time, the evidence has begun to grow recently that some of the most serious problems of modern America involve unprecedented changes that bring social tention than it has received. At the same time, the discussion leads to some disheartening thoughts about the problem of social change in America.

Third, even if institutional reform could be realized, there is some reason to question whether the rather diffuse notion of institutional decay is as basic a source of American troubles as Mr. Gardner and many others like to think it is.

There can be no question that institutions of government often seem unresponsive and inefficient, and that there is room not only to improve specific governmental mechanisms but also, as Mr. Gardner suggests, to encourage the feeling both in and out of government that social institutions should continually renew themselves to keep abreast of change.

At the same time, the evidence has begun to grow recently that some of the most serious problems of modern America involve unprecedented changes that bring social strains down to a personal level.

The problem of pollution won't be solved entirely until every American understands, and accepts the fact that a clean environment isn't compatible with all the comforts and conveniences he may take for granted. The agonies of Vietnam might have been avoided had every American understood and accepted the uncomfortable ambiguities of the U.S. role as a superpower. Increasingly bitter cultural factionalism may not come under control completely until people learn to treat what the media show them with a bit of perspective.

And while more responsive social institutions might help, it is hard to see how they can do more than ease the strains a bit. If the idea that institutional reforms won't make things much better, but only less worse, begins to gain acceptance—as it must—how much support can a Common Cause organization hope to retain?

No Startling Answer

Mr. Gardner has no startling answers to these questions. "You can't let yourself be paralyzed by the complexities of the problem," he says. And he adds: "I don't want to rule out the possibility that we're head-over-heels into something we can't control. But if you look at the current situation, you see that we've left some of our most important institutions untouched for many years. We haven't done all we can."

Indeed, he goes on, the most important thing is to try. And he quotes some lines from T. S. Eliot: "For us there is only the trying. The rest is not our business/Home is where one starts from. As we grow older/The world becomes stranger, the pattern more complicated."

All of which leads to the conclusion that perhaps Common Cause is for Mr. Gardner mainly a matter of temperamental imperative more than the result of an absolutely hard headed assessment of current troubles. And if one may wish him well, it is only with a feeling of depression over his chances for success.

'A Reverse Klan':

NAACP's Roy Wilkins Scores Separatism of 'Black Power'

The following is excerpted from an address by Roy Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, at the organization's recent convention in Los Angeles.

ALL ABOUT US are alarms and confusions as well as great and challenging developments. Differences of opinion are sharper. For the first time since several organizations began to function where only two had functioned before, there emerges what seems to be a difference in goals.

Heretofore there were some differences in methods and emphasis but none in ultimate goals. The end was always to be the inclusion of the American Negro, without racial discrimination, as a full-fledged equal in all phases of American citizenship.

There has now emerged, first, a strident and threatening challenge to a strategy widely employed by civil rights groups, namely non-violence. One organization which has been meeting in Baltimore has passed a resolution declaring for defense of themselves by Negro citizens if they are attacked.

This position is not new as far as the NAACP is concerned. Historically our association has defended in court those persons who have defended themselves and their homes with firearms.

But neither have we couched a policy of manly resistance in such a way that our members and supporters felt compelled to maintain themselves in an armed state, ready to retaliate instantly and in kind whenever attacked.

We venture the observation that such a publicized posture could serve to stir counterplanning, counteraction and possible conflict. If carried out literally as instant retaliation, in cases adjudged by aggrieved persons to have been grossly unjust, this policy could produce—in extreme situations—lynchings, or in better-sounding phraseology, private vigilante vengeance.

Moreover, in attempting to substitute for derelict law enforcement machinery, the policy entails the risk of a broader, more indiscriminate crackdown by law officers under the ready-made excuse of restoring law and order.

It seems reasonable to assume that proclaimed protective violence is as likely to encourage counterviolence as it is to discourage violent persecution.

But the more serious division in the civil rights movement is one posed by a word formulation that implies clearly a difference in goals.

No matter how endlessly they try to explain it, the term "black power" means antiwhite power. In a racially pluralistic society, the concept, the formation and the exercise of that ethnically tagged power means opposition to other ethnic powers. In the black-and-white relationship, it has to mean that every other ethnic power is the rival and the antagonist of "black power." It has to mean "going it alone." It has to mean separatism.

NOW SEPARATISM, whether on the rarefied debate level of "black power" or on the wishful level of a secessionist Freedom City in Watts, offers a disadvantaged minority little except a chance to shrivel and die.

Ideologically it dictates "up with black and down with white" in precisely the same manner that South Africa reverses that slogan.

It is a reverse Mississippi, a reverse Hitler, a reverse Ku Klux Klan.

If these were evil in our judgment, what virtue can we claim for black over white? If, as some proponents claim, this concept instills pride of race, cannot this pride be taught without preaching hatred or supremacy based on race?

Though it be clarified and clarified again, "black power" in the quick, uncritical and highly emotional adoption it has received from some segments of a beleaguered people, can mean in the end only black death. Even if, through some miracle, it should be enthroned briefly, the human spirit, which knows no color or geography or time, would die a little, leaving for wiser and stronger and more compassionate men the painful beating back to the upper trail.

Memphis Local Wins 21-28c Raises at Quaker Feed Mills

MEMPHIS, Tenn.—Local 19 has just negotiated a three-year renewal agreement that covers 65 workers of the Quaker Feed Mills of this city. The agreement, effective Nov. 7, provides an across-the-board increase of seven cents an hour during each of the three years, plus five cents an hour differential for the 3 to 11 p.m. shift and seven cents for the 11 p.m. to 7 a.m. shift. For the first time, the agreement contains a severance pay clause which calls for one week's pay for each year of service up to 20 years in the event the company closes its plant.

An additional clause calls on the company to pay 62 percent of average salary to any worker laid off due to a lack of work. The maximum period under this clause is 26 weeks. Improved medical and surgical provisions and betterment of the retirement and pension plans were also written into the agreement.

The local negotiated another three-year agreement covering more than 35 employees of the Allied Feed Mills of Memphis. The contract, which takes effect Nov. 15, calls for an across-the-board increase of six cents an hour each year, with an additional five cents going to five workers whose jobs were reclassified.

The agreement provides improved vacations, life insurance for each worker paid for by the company and medical and hospital coverage.

Pres. Earl H. Fisher headed the local's bargaining committees at the shops.

Making Better Use of Existing Housing

The production of housing at a rate of approximately 2.6 million units per year would require a massive shift of national resources. This chapter addresses some of the large questions raised by this ambitious production target. Does the American economy have the resources-in business skills, trained manpower, capital, land, and technical know-how — to support a massive expansion of housing production? What strains will be created in the economy by a major shift of resources to housing? Our conclusions are generally optimistic. If the nation makes a major commitment to provide adequate housing for all its citizens, the job can be done within a decade. Reaching this goal will require sacrifices in other areas, but these sacrifices are well within the capacity of a country as wealthy and productive as the United States.

We have also found it necessary to assess the efficiency with which the existing housing industry is operating. If housing can be built more cheaply and more quickly than it is at present, use of more efficient production systems would lower the amount of subsidies required from government, and lessen the strains on the rest of the economy of a massive housing program. Accordingly, we have sought to evaluate the rate of technological progress in the industry, to estimate the seriousness of any constraints to greater efficiency and to devise recommendations for improving indutry efficiency. In addition, we have explored methods for assuring that minority groups are afforded full opportunities to serve in entrepreneurial capacities and to take advantage of employment opportunities. We have also considered what policies are appropriate to bring the talents of the nation's best scientific and technical manpower to bear on the problem of housing production.

We conclude that much can be done to improve the efficiency of the housing industry. Steps to this end should be given high national priority. Since roughly $25 billion has been spent each year on residential construction, even marginal cost reductions on each unit, when multiplied by total production, become significant. The removal of constraints to greater efficiency and the encouragement of technical innovations may ultimately have a very significant effect on the cost of housing. We have also concluded, however, that new technology alone will not be sufficient to bring good housing with with the means of the entire urban population.

1. An Overview of the Housing Industry:

A Fragmented, Complicated Process.

The "housing industry"—defined here to include all those firms which share in the receipts of expenditures for housing—ic one of the most complex in the American economy. The firms which play the critical role of putting together the finished housing unit make up the heart of the industry. The home assemblers include homebuilders, contractors, home manufacturers (and their dealers) and mobile home producers. These firms procure their materials from an extraordinary range of building products manufacturers, which range from tiny millwork plants to some of the nation's largest corporations. Distribution of these materials from manufacturer to assembler is carried out primarily by specialized wholealers and retailers—lumberyards and hardware stores, for example. Acquisition and preparation of land for the ultimate construction of housing commonly involves real estate brokers, lawyers, title insurance companies, surveyors, and civil engineers, and possibly land planners and landscape architects. Much of the on-site construction work is characteristically performed by specialty subcontractors, for painting, plumbing ,and electrical work, for example. Financing, needed both by the builders to complete construction and development, and by buyers to finance purchase of completed units, is available through a battery of lending institutions. Operation of apartments may involve superintendents or management firms. The maintenance of housing adds to the cast of characters—for example, repairmen, janitors, remodeling firms, and domestic workers.

Thus the housing industry is made up of literally millions and millions of business enterprises. Most of these are small and specialized. Competition throughout the industry is characteristically fierce. It is incorrect to speak of the need to involve private enterprise in housing production; the housing industry is already one of the mightiest basions of the private enterprise system.

that it will bring about appropriate changes in housing supply to correspond to the changes in demand.

The Importance of Housing in the Economy

Housing, broadly defined, is the premier consumer good in the United States. Americans spend over $100 billion annually to buy, ent, operate and maintain their places of residence. About half of this amount goes for direct housing expenditures (such as rents or mortgage payments) and the remaining haf for utiities, furniture, domestic hep, and other household operations. In addition, residential structures and their sites constitute almost one third of the national wealth. More than one quarter of new capital investment each year goes into housing.

Money Spent. Most of the money spent on housing goes to purchase the use of the existing stock. New residential construction adds only 2% or3% each year to the total housing stock. Rougly 10% of the gross national product each year is devoted to construction of all kinds. Residential buildings are the object of roughly 1/3 of total annual construction expenditures.) Recently the value of private residential construction has averaged around $25 billion per year. Roughly $5 billion of this is spent for additions to and alterations of, existing housing.

The importance of housing in the economy underscores the public need for efficient operation in this industry. If the cost of new housing in place can be cut by 5% (with no corresponding drop in value) then this will result in an annual savings in the American economy of $1 billion in capital. Similarly, American consumers would save $1 billion for every 1% reduction in the total cost of owning, renting, and operating their residences.

It is likely that housing will maintain its present importance in the American economy over the next several decades. It has long been assumed that as families grow richer, they spend a smaller percentage of their income on housing. If this were indeed tre case, housing should become relatively less important over time as personal income rises. However, the best recent evidence (Margaret G. Reid's Housing and Income) indicates that high-quality housing is one of the most desired luxury goods to the American consumer. If this is the case, the housing industry should maintain (or possibly even improve) its relative importance in the American economy.

The Characteristics of Housing

The structure of the housing industry has evolved in response to the distinctive characteristics of its product. Housing is quite different from soap, shirts, or sports cars. Its distinctive characteristics require a production and merchandising system unlike those typical in manufacturing.

1. Housing is tied to land.

The fact that housing developments are inevitably associated with land operations has numerous consequences. Land development has historically been regulated primarily by local governments who typically impose a battery of building and mechanical codes, zoning ordinances, and subdivision regulations on potential builders. The tradition of local regulation of building contributes to the localization of markets.

	Conventional Single-Family homes	Mobile home	Elevator Unit
Debt retirement	53%	55%	42%
Taxes	26%	4%	14%

Vacancies, bad debts, & profit	—	—	16%
	100%	100%	100%

Builders, lenders, and real estate brokers often must learn a new set of rules each time they venture from their home territory. The fact that housing units are immobile also means that their value is largely determined by the neighborhood in which they are situated. Builders must be concerned not only with whether the structure itself will appeal to the market, but also with whether there will be any demand for that structure on the sites where it can be built. Lastly, the fact that housing is tied to land means its transfer is carried out under the cumbersome and often archaic procedures of real property law.

2. Housing is durable.

A house or apartment building, if structurally sound when built, may last for centuries. Repair and replacements can remedy what deterioration in materials that may occur, and may even forestall market obolescence. One of the consequences of the durability of housing is that the existing inventory of structures dominates the market. As noted, the annual production of housing units, at least in recent years, has added only between 2% and 3% to the total stock. The dominance of the existing stock in the market means that housing production can be deferred for long periods (during wars or depressions, for example,) and contributes to instability in rates of output. In addition, the durability of housing

The intertangling of input substitution with technological change raises problems if one is interested in determining whether technological change has been taking place. In fact, if tracing the sources and applications of new knowledge is one's primary interest, productivity analysis is a very crude tool indeed. On the other hand, substitution responses to input price changes are likely to be as important as new technology in determining efficiency changes. Saying the same thing differently, the effect on costs of changing the production process os as to use relatively cheaper inputs in place of relatively more expensive ones may be as strong as the ecect of changing the production process so as to use previously unknown techniques.

Analyzing changes in productivity ratios may therefore provide information about response to the whole range of possibilities for improved efficiency, even if such analysis cannot separate the advancement of knowledge from input substitution.

*The cost of hiring an architect is one principal rea4on for this higher figure.

There is one situation in which productivity change, technological change, and efficiency change all coincide. If input requirements per unit of output are all falling simultaneously, all productivity ratios will be increasing, efficiency will be rising, and technological change must take place.[3] Inspired by this fact, economists

3. The last conclusion follows because unless a newly adopted technique which reduces all input requirements is a newly invented technique, producers were failing to maximize profits before the change in technique.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT

COMMITTEE SECRETARY SULLIVAN: This Resolution covers the substance of Resolutions 37 (Book 1, page 41), part of 64 (Book 1, page 68), 86 (Book 2, page 6) and 91 (Book 2, page 18).

It calls on Congress to increase the minimum wage to $2.00 an hour; extend the Act's coverage to all workers engaged in or affecting interstate commerce; provide for the payment of double-time for overtime; and improve the enforcement of the Act. It also calls for equivalent increases in federal minimum wage rates in Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands and American Samoa.

The Committee recommends the adoption of Resolution 198 and I so move.

. . . The motion was seconded.

VICE-PRESIDENT A. PHILIP RANDOLPH: President Meany, I should like the delegates to this Convention to know that on the 29th of June, 1965, testimony on behalf of a higher minimum wage and extended coverage was delivered before the House Committee on Education and Labor in the name of the leaders of all of the major civil rights organizations. This strong appeal to Congress was made by Roy Wilkins, James Farmer, Dorothy Height, James Forman, Bayard Rustin, Martin Luther King and myself.

This united leadership was at great pains to make clear to the committee that there are two major obstacles to the ultimate achievement of the civil rights revolution: one is segregation and discrimination; the other is economic deprivation. We stated to the Labor Committee that no single act could so drastically alter immediately the status of the working poor, black and white, as the passage of an act containing a higher minimum wage and extended coverage. If vigorously enforced such an act would bring millions and millions of dollars into the pockets of the working poor, giving them the power to deal with many of their own problems and restoring to them the dignity that springs from elementary economic stability.

The labor movement will find that in this struggle to obtain such an act, no stone will be left unturned by the civil rights groups to ensure its passage in the 90th Congress.

As I said yesterday, President Meany, I want to thank you and all those on the Executive Council; I want to thank my dear friend, Secretary-Treasurer Bill Schnitzler for his steadfast, effective and inspiring leadership of the AFL-CIO civil rights committee of which he is chairman; I want to thank all the members of the civil rights committee for the arduous and the often unheralded work which they have carried on to bring fraternity, dignity and equality, not only to the house of labor but also to this great nation.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, I support the Resolution for a minimum wage.

PRESIDENT MEANY: Is there further discussion?

I think Brother Randolph has emphasized again the close connection there is between the question of civil rights, full civil rights for the Negro and his economic situation. This is why amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act is of such tremendous importance.

Is there further discussion? If not, those who favor the motion to adopt signify by saying aye; contrary.

It is carried and so ordered.

VOTER REGISTRATION SURVEY IN VIRGINIA

This survey was made by the VCHR. The following methods were used to complete a survey of certain localities in Virginia --- a mailed survey form to local Councils on Human Relations in 36 areas of Virginia, VCHR staff visits to courthouses not covered by local Councils on Human Relations, newspaper articles, and interviews with residents in the areas surveyed. The Virginia Election Laws, Civil Rights Act of 1964 (Title I Voting), and the 1965 Voting Rights Act were used as the background to discover violations and trends in voter registration. The survey was made between June 1, 1965 and September 1, 1965, with a revisit to areas where changes were noted from the information originally obtained.

The purpose of this survey is to point out apparent violations of the Virginia Election Laws and the Voting Rights Act of 1965, and also to increase the percentage of voter registration by making the procedure more convenient and easier for the prospective registrant.

MEMORANDUM

TO: Local Councils
FROM: Robert L. Combs
DATE:
SUBJECT: Voter Registration Survey

You probably have read in the newspapers that the VCHR Staff has been conducting a voter registration survey in certain Virginia Counties. Would you please assist us and your locality by making the survey which follows:

Name of Council on Human Relations _____

Name of County (or City surveyed) _____

1. Has there been a change from district registrars to a central registrar? When did the change take place?

2. State the day, time, and place for registration?

3. Is voter registration being publicly advertised?
   By Newspapers
   By Printed Forms Posted in Public Places (Court House)

4. Are all citizens receiving their poll tax notices?
   Have you discovered any device to discourage the paying of poll taxes (Marked through the bill, or person told not necessary to pay poll taxes, etc.)

5. Are voter registration list posted in public places (voting places) being made available to the public?
   Are they listed by race?

6. Are poll tax records being made available to the public?
   Are they listed by race?

7. Are you aware of violations to Title I, Voting of the Civil Rights Act of 1964? (Do you have a copy of the laws?)

8. Are you aware of any violations of the Virginia Election Laws? (Do you have a copy of the Virginia Election Laws?)

9. Have you noticed any pattern developing, not mentioned above which might be a means of making voter registration more complex or might tend to discourage people from registering to vote?

II. CHANGES IN REGISTRATION PROCEDURES

A. Many areas in Virginia have, since January 1965, changed from district registrars to a central registrar -- Lunenburg, Amelia, Nottoway, Brunswick and Sussex. Prince Edward and Surry Counties have had this procedure for several years.

B. The change brought about brief hours and once or twice per month for the time to register. Amelia (9-5, second Saturday each month), Brunswick (5 day week 30 days prior to an election), Lunenburg (10-2, second and fourth Thursday of each month), Nottoway (two days per month) and Sussex (one day per month) were some examples in question. This caused a hardship on all races of people who were of the working class. A press release was issued on July 16, 1965, pointing out this fact. Since that date, and also due to demonstrations by SCLC-SCOPE and Virginia Students' Civil Rights Committee, some counties changed their policy by allowing more days and more hours--such as Lunenburg, Nottoway and Sussex. We wish to express our appreciation for these changes.

C. Some county officials made statements to the press (Richmond Times-Dispatch, Tuesday, July 20, 1965) that the reason for a central registrar in place of district registrars was due to -- efficiency, cost saving factors and difficulties in retaining sufficient qualified registrars for a district system. This appears to be true.

D. It is the opinion of the VCHR that the reason was also a "subtle" practice to keep the central registration office closed most of the time during the month which appeared to be another way of denying the right to vote to large groups (white and Negro) in Virginia. This new procedure worked a hardship especially upon the Negro and the laboring class of whites, who in most cases would have to get off from work in order to register to vote.

E. Therefore, the number of registered voters have been low in relationship to the number eligible to be registered, which reflects upon the voter registration story of Virginia. The past has not been a very good record.

III. ADVERTISEMENT OF VOTER REGISTRATION

A. Registrars are failing to post in public places the time of such sitting for the Registrar for the purpose of registering qualified voters. Visits were made to such places as courthouses, general stores in rural areas, service stations and post offices. The following counties did not have the time, date and place posted in a public place for the purpose of registering qualified voters—Chesterfield, Essex, Isle of Wight, James City, Louisa, Nansemond, Prince George, Southampton, Surry and Sussex. Dinwiddie during July did not have the notice posted, then in early August had the notice posted and the latter part of August it was removed. Charles City had a printed notice posted, but the information written in ink was not legible.

B. Newspapers were not checked to see if notices were given by this means.

C. It is the belief of the VCHR that newspaper notices and the posting of a written or printed notice should be used. Many people were experiencing difficulty in discovering this information about the date, time and place in order to register to vote.

D. Virginia Election Laws, #24-75. "Notice of time of such sitting. ---He shall give notice of the time and place at which he will sit for the purpose set out in the preceding section for at least ten days before each sitting by posting written or printed notices thereof at ten or more public places in his jurisdiction or by publication in a newspaper of general circulation therein."

E. It should be noted that some counties are posting a written or printed form to advertise voter registration.

IV. POLL TAX PAYMENTS AND POLL TAX LISTS:

1. Poll Tax Payments:

A. Registration Confusion—Some Negro citizens in Sussex County who had paid their poll tax and registered to vote between the period of May-October 1964 with the understanding that they had registered for ALL elections. When these residents attempted to vote in the July 13, 1965 Democratic Primary, they were informed at the polls, "you are not registered to vote in this election." Citizens signed a statement for VCHR swearing to the truth of these events.

B. Mr. Herbert Coulton, Virginia Field Secretary of SCLC, stated that in July 1965 certain residents of Sussex County attempted to pay their poll taxes. The County officials in the Treasurer's Office stated, "we do not have the proper tax receipts for the prior years, you must come back in order to pay your back poll taxes."

C. County Officials in James City County several years ago mailed personal property tax statements with the poll tax section marked out to certain Negro residents. When these Negro residents went to pay their poll tax they were told by county officials in the tax office, "it was NOT necessary to pay the poll tax." The VCHR staff interviewed several Negro ministers of the county to verify these statements and discovered it was a true statement, but had happened about two years ago.

D. It is a general practice not to send out poll tax statements to many residents. The Virginia Beach Council on Human Relations discovered that you had to be a previous voter, or request such a statement, before the city treasurer would send the resident a bill for poll tax.

E. Mr. Henry E. Howell, an attorney from Norfolk and a member of the VCHR Board, has attempted through court proceedings to make the State of Virginia collect back poll taxes. The local treasurers of city and county governments do not attempt, in most cases, to collect poll taxes that are in arrears.

F. The Daily Progress Newspaper, July 31, 1965 Editorial, page 4. "Virginia Should Act Anyway...As a revenue-raising device, the poll tax is demonstrably feeble...As a means of keeping the election rolls up to date, the poll tax is equally clumsy and outdated...An additional objection to the poll tax that has been cited is contained in the unfair suspicion it creates that Virginia is using it as a means of discrimination against potential voters...the case against poll taxes is so strong that Virginia should take the initiative to rid itself of this archaic political remnant."

G. Since passage of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, most of the problems in attempting to register to vote have been with the City or County Treasurer. Lunenburg, Nottoway and Dinwiddie Counties have had confusion over which year to pay. The City of Richmond attempted to assess property values and its payment before accepting poll tax payment.

IV. POLL TAX PAYMENTS AND POLL TAX LISTS - Cont'd.

2. Poll Tax Lists:

A. Poll tax lists are not being kept accurately in some localities. The City of Williamsburg and James City County residents involved in the recent annexation found themselves having difficulty in attempting to vote in the July 13, 1965 Democratic Primary according to members of the Williamsburg Council on Human Relations. It was discovered that, due to mistakes in the recordd of poll tax lists, there was an undue burden placed on the qualified registered voter when he attempted to vote.

B. Evidence was acquired to prove that Dinwiddie and Lunenburg Counties published poll tax lists according to race for the year 1965. Photographs were taken by VCHR staff of their respective courthouse bulletin boards and registrar's bulletin boards. Copy of the poll tax list was obtained from Lunenburg County. Unconfirmed reports exist that this case also exists in Chesterfield County.

C. The case of Hamm vs. Virginia State Board of Elections was decided by the Federal District Court and affirmed by the U.S. Supreme Court, stating in effect, "localities in Virginia as of January 1, 1965, were supposed to discontinue maintaining separate poll tax lists for Negroes and whites, and to discontinue segregating voter registration lists in the same manner."

D. In the case of Dinwiddie and Lunenburg Counties, the publishing of lists of taxpayers who have paid their poll tax by race is probably a violation of the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in the Hamm case. It appears that if this practice continues there may be a possibility that a contempt of court proceeding could be instigated by citizens of the state against the Virginia State Board of Elections and the Virginia State Tax Commissioner.

E. Since many counties would not allow even residents to see the poll tax lists, it is believed that possibly there are other counties following this same unlawful pattern.

F. Visits were made by VCHR staff immediately following the July 13, 1965 Democratic Primary and no posting of the poll tax list could be found on courthouse bulletin boards in the following counties:

Amelia
Chesterfield (visited in August, failed to find the list)
Charles City (August 1965 after a revisit it was posted)
Essex
Henrico (visited in August 1965)
Isle of Wight
James City
Nansemond
Nottoway
Powhatan (visited in August 1965)
Prince George
Surry
Sussex (unconfirmed report, citizens could not obtain list)

This also applies to the City of Virginia Beach, according to the local Council on Human Relations.

V. VOTER REGISTRATION LISTS

A. In July 1965, VCHR staff observed on the James City County Court-House bulletin board two (2) lists posted by the City of Williamsburg which read as follows:

List #1

"City of Williamsburg Office of Registrar of Voters COLORED Registrations for Federal Election only from Jan. 1 to Oct. 3, 1964"
(a page listing the names of Negroes who were eligible to vote)

List #2

"City of Williamsburg Office of Registrar of Voters WHITE Registrations for Federal Election only from Jan. 1 to Oct. 3, 1964"
(a page listing names of white persons eligible to vote)

(Refer to newspaper account--The Daily Press, Newport News, Aug. 10, 1965. "Complaints of Confusion Registered for Vote Here")

B. In many counties surveyed, the VCHR staff could not find the voter registration list posted on the courthouse bulletin board.

C. The Virginia Beach Council stated that they were not aware of these lists being posted.

D. Again, the survey made by VCHR staff was made soon after the Democratic Primary, July 13, 1965.

E. County Registrars were not posting a registration list in accordance to paragraph 24-78 of the Virginia Election Laws. This section reads ... "---It shall be the duty of the registrar within five days after each sitting to have posted at three or more public places in his jurisdiction separate or printed lists of the names of all persons so admitted to registration, under #24-67 and #24-67.1, respectively..." It was the belief of legal counsel and the VCHR that this action may possibly be a violation of the Virginia Election Laws. The VCHR failed to find the posting of new voter registration lists being posted at public places (such as Courthouse Bulletin Boards, outside of Registrar's office, etc.) in the following counties--Amelia, Charles City, Chesterfield, Dinwiddie, Henrico, James City, Louisa, Lunenburg, Nottoway and Prince George.

VI. COMPLIANCE TO THE U. S. VOTING RIGHTS ACT OF 1965

A. This brief survey is not to assume that these cases listed were the only violations of the 1965 Voting Rights Act. The purpose is to reveal a sudden interesting trend that was not as evident prior to the passage of the ACT.

B. Nottoway County Registrar officials would have had seven complaints filed against them, but the VCHR staff was successful in negotiations. Six complaints were on the grounds that attempts were used by certain registration officials to intimidate the people attempting to register to vote by the conversation which occurred between the parties in question. One complaint was on the grounds of intimidation of a citizen who was aiding the people in their attempt to register to vote.

C. A person who was assisting citizens to register to vote signed a formal complaint against the Lunenburg County Treasurer on the basis of the conversation between the two parties and the citizens' attempt to pay their poll taxes for the current year.

D. Staff from the VCHR negotiated with the Treasurer of Dinwiddie County in order to prevent a formal complaint from being filed by certain citizens on a day of registration.

E. Other County Treasurers were confused about the procedure of poll tax payments in relationship to the Virginia State Election Laws and to the new U. S. Voting Rights Act.

F. The NAACP negotiated with the City Treasurer of Richmond when he made a requirement that a citizen must first be assessed for his personal property tax and this must be paid before the acceptance of the poll tax payment. This procedure was soon clarified.

THE IMPACT OF THE NEGRO ON LOUISIANA'S FUTURE

The President's Council of Economic Advisers recently reported that:

"Negroes have not been sharing fully in the abundance of our economy. On the average, they have less education, work in less skilled occupations, suffer more unemployment, and get paid lower wages.

"If Negroes received the same average pay as whites having the same education, the personal income of Negroes and of the nation would be $12.8 billion higher. This is a measure of the effect of discrimination in employment.

"If Negroes also had the same educational attainments as white workers, earned the same pay and experienced the same employment percentage as whites, their personal income--and that of the nation--would be $20.6 billion higher.

"The entire economy would benefit from better education of Negro workers and an end to job discrimination. Industry would earn additional profits. The total Gross National Product would rise by an estimated $23 billion--an additional 3.7 per cent."

These statements by the President's Advisers are no doubt true--but they would apply with equal or greater force among many other non-white groups -- the Mexican-American, the Indian, and others.

And, here in Louisiana, because of our high illiteracy rate among the poor whites, identical statements would apply in the educational and economic fields.

But, there can be no question about the fact that so far as opportunity is concerned, the Negro is more discriminated against than is any other Louisiana group. Among Louisiana citizens, he truly has far less opportunity for advancement--educationally and economically.

He has less chance for acceptability in the social, political, religious, educational, business, industrial, and union worlds.

And where he is accepted, quite often it is because legally he must be accepted, or at least tolerated.

And, so, under these conditions, we find that the Negro in Louisiana usually hesitates to take advantage of opportunities that may be open to him.

For instance, he legally has the right to apply for admittance to apprenticeship training programs but most Negroes who could qualify under such programs make no effort to do so.

Generally speaking, a high school education is required and in most cases this requirement has existed for 15 or 20 years.

Educationally speaking, many Negroes could meet this requirement but the percentage of them as compared to the total Negro population is far less than the percentage of whites as compared to the white population.

In most cases, the white youth who applies for apprenticeship training comes from a family where the father, uncle, cousin or other close relative is also employed as a skilled craftsman. This tends to encourage the white youth to seek this form of occupation.

This is seldom true in the case of the Negro youth. With few exceptions, the Negro high school graduate does not have close relatives who are skilled craftsmen in the accepted sense of the word.

Therefore, he does not receive the knowledge, encouragement, or assistance that will cause him to actively seek to enter the apprenticeship programs.

He must apply before his 26th birthday. Usually the Negro youth, leaving high school, considers other occupations as more desirous, at least for several years. Quite often he finds that he is disqualified because of age when he finally determines to consider the apprenticeship program.

I readily admit that in addition to these problems, sometimes he faces hostile employer and union forces who operate within the framework of the law but who would prefer that he not qualify and, therefore, offer no assistance or encouragement.

It stands to reason that in a field foreign to him and in an atmosphere that does not necessarily remind him of home, he seldom can qualify.

This does not apply in most cases--in fact, it really happens in relatively few instances--but these are the ones that are remembered--and are spoken of--and, therefore, have a great impact on future applicants.

In fact, some skilled crafts in Louisiana are predominantly Negro. The bricklayers' unions are approximately 80% Negro. This is a high skill - high wage occupation.

In 1966, there were 1,209 new apprentices in all trades approved in Louisiana. About 16% of the new apprentices were Negro. Since the Negro population of Louisiana is approximately 32% of the total, this means, of course, that for the Negro to be enrolled in the apprenticeship program in proportion to his per cent of the population, he must at least double his enrollment.

This obviously will not happen unless many changes are made--and most of the needed changes are not directly related to the apprenticeship program.

Education, it seems to me, is the key--and I speak of education in a broad sense.

Improved formal education is a must, of course. There can be no doubt that the educational opportunities and standards for the Negro are inferior to those of the white, and the improvements that have been made took place only in very recent years.

Therefore, the results of the changes will not become apparent in the immediate future.

More rapid transition and improvement must be made in our educational system--with emphasis being placed on better quality education for Negroes.

More effort must go into making better employment opportunities available to qualified Negroes.

Programs of employment must be especially designed to encourage the educated Negro youth to remain in Louisiana and not migrate to other states--thereby leaving, in the majority in Louisiana, the uneducated, unskilled, unqualified Negro.

Negroes themselves must realize that this is a competitive world--in employment--in opportunities--in education-in social standing--and in acceptability.

I say that because one of the problems that remains unsolved in spite of all recent legislative and social changes is the unwillingness on the part of some Negro leaders to engage competitively in fields where they are well qualified and where they have the opportunity to make changes.

Witness the fact that in labor unions where the law requires that white and Negro locals merge, strong resistance often comes from the Negro section as well as the white section. This occurs in professional organizations, too.

Note the unwillingness on the part of the white Louisiana Teachers Association and the Negro Louisiana Education Association to comply with the N. E. A. directive to merge.

The officers of the Negro group are adamant about the merger--and so are the whites.

Quite often the attitude of the white is dictated by prejudice but the Negro's attitude is motivated by his reluctance or inability to compete with the white unionist or teacher.

This brings about many problems. It prolongs the day when the Negro can compete successfully with the white in an integrated society--it tends to cause him to accept and sometimes be satisfied with a lesser role or position of employment.

In many fields of endeavor such as sports, entertainment and military, the Negro has proven that he can successfully compete when he truly makes an all-out effort. He can do likewise in education and work skills if the opportunity and motivation is present.

Society owes him the educational and work opportunities but he must furnish the motivation.

When these two things are accomplished, society will no longer face the charge of discrimination--and the Negro no longer will have less education, work in less skilled occupations, suffer more unemployment, and get paid lower wages.

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

NEW BLACK GROUP IN WASHINGTON ENDORSES NIXON

A newly formed group of young Black Washington residents have endorsed Republican Richard M. Nixon for President.

The group is called D. C. Blacks for a 2-Party Voice and was formed, according to one of its founders, to develop a power base for the Republican party in the City in the event Nixon wins.

In a statement released this week, the group said:

"Not one black man of national stature has enthusiatically or even warmly endorsed Hubert Humphrey, whereas Nixon has been endorsed by leaders among which includes Mrs. Myrtle Ollison, President of the National Association of Colored Womens Clubs."

The group said that the Democratic voter registration in the District far exceeds the Republican but that a vote for Humphrey would be a "vote wasted."

The group said that black people have to be a part of the power structure and put their needs first.

A member of the group said that it was founded on "the concept that black Americans must have representation in the mainstream of political power regardless of the party in power," and that black people can do that it it has a base from which the Republicans can operate.

The Democratic party has traditionally attracted Negroes and as a result there is a huge void in black strength in the Republican party, according to Joseph McLaughlin, a District businessman and a member of the new group.

McLaughlin, in charge of co-ordinating the group's activities, said its membership of about 50 is growing at the rate of 20 a day and predicts there would be 1,000 persons on its rolls by the first of next week.

Members of the group include: Dr. James Sheppard, a local physician; Floyd Anderson, an attorney; Enoch Butler, an anti-poverty worked; Herbert Muriel, an attorney; Leon Hawkins, a private contractor; and Dr. Herman Stamps, a professor of Dentistry at Howard University.

Voting Law's Impact

Registration by Negroes In the South Falls Off Following Initial Flurry

Apathy and Fear Keep Many From Signing Up; More Federal Registrars Sought Encounter in a Country Store

By NEIL MAXWELL
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

JACKSON, Miss.—In a country store near Beulah, 120 miles northwest of here, a young white girl in light colored jeans and a turtleneck sweater pleads with three Negroes to register to vote. One intently studies a row of Campbell Soup labels, another stares at his dusty, high-topped shoes, and the third drifts off. After 20 minutes without evoking a response, the girl, a civil rights worker from California named Kay Lynn Norman, gives up.

That pretty well sums up what's happening in the Negro voter registration drive in the South. It started off with a bang after Congress passed the new voting rights law last summer, with 180,000 new Negro voters added to the rolls in three months in the seven Southern states affected by the act. But now registrations have slowed to a trickle, and it appears that predictions the new law would lead almost overnight to the acquisition of immense new political power by Negroes were far wide of the mark.

The causes of Dixie Negroes' reluctance to register, even where Federal voting registrars have been assigned, are proving frustratingly difficult to combat. Overwhelming apathy, born both of near-illiteracy and of a habitual indifference to the political matters, they had no voice in for so long, keeps thousands of Negroes from signing up to vote. Another deterrent is a vague, unreasoning anxiety over invading what has been the white man's domain. And there are more specific fears of economic or physical reprisals for Negroes who try to exercise their new rights.

It all adds up to rough going for civil rights workers, who already have their hands full with harassment from white segregationists.

"Some of Them Lie"

"We've been running into a whole bag of problems," says Hunter Morey, a thin, crew-cut white youth who works for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) here in Mississippi's capital city. "Working door to door, some of them lie to you and tell you they are already registered just to get rid of you, and others won't even answer the door. Even some of the ones who will talk argue that there's no sense in registering—who are they going to vote for?"

Some 3.4 million Negroes of voting age live in the Southern states at which the voting law is aimed. Of these Negroes, 1.3 million, or 39%, are now registered. In the same group of states, there are 16.6 million whites of voting age. Of these, 7.3 million, or 44%, are registered.

Last summer the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., forecast that the new voting law's simplified procedures and restrictions on the use of literacy tests would add a million new Negro voters to the rolls in the South within a year. Now the civil rights leader says this total won't be reached unless Washington sends more Federal registrars into the South to enroll Negro voters. This step is authorized for areas that are particularly obdurate about opening the polls to Negroes, and so far the Justice Department has assigned registrars to 32 counties in four states—Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and South Carolina. Earlier this month the U.S. Civil Rights Commission, in a report to Attorney General Katzenbach, agreed with Mr. King that more Federal registrars are needed.

Idle Registrars

Current registration activity in Mississippi, however, suggests that more registrars are far from the whole answer to the problem. For the Federal registrars now on duty in the state aren't doing much business, even though large blocs of unregistered Negroes remain in the counties to which they have been assigned.

Mississippi is probably the state where Negroes have most to gain by registering and voting in force. There are 422,256 Negroes of voting age in the state, compared with 748,-218 whites. Before the voting law was passed, some 33,000, or 8%, of the potential Negro voters were registered, compared with 71% of the whites.

Now another 23,000 Negroes have been registered. But almost all the gain came in the days immediately after the Federal registrars' offices were opened, and since then Negroes have shown scant interest in registering. What has happened in Madison County, just to the north of Jackson, is fairly representative of developments in the 14 Mississippi counties to which Federal registrars were assigned.

In Madison County, 3,896 Negroes signed up at the registrars' office, located in a vacant store in the Negro section of the town of Canton, in the initial two weeks it was open in August. But in the four weeks from Sept. 24 to Oct. 23, only 44 more Madison County Negroes were registered. And, a spokesman for the office said recently, "it's down a lot more since then. Last week five showed up, but the week before there were only three." With traffic so light, the Madison County office is open only on Saturday now, instead of five and a half days a week as it was at first.

Picking Cotton

The slowdown doesn't stem from lack of effort by civil rights workers. Miss Norman, a SNCC volunteer, tells back-country Mississippi Negroes over and over that "what you've got to do is get together and stand up for yourselves, and the first step you've got to take is to go down there and register to vote." The Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party, a mostly Negro organization that is the dominant force in the registration campaign in the state, has deployed teams of workers throughout the state. To talk to Negro tenants on cotton plantations, whose owners and overseers usually run off rights workers if they spot them, members of the teams frequently have taken jobs as extra cotton-picking hands during the harvest now ending.

But Roosevelt White, a Negro on a registration team that has been working in Bolivar County, cite of the town of Beulah, says: "When the 11 of us can talk 20 Negroes into going down to the courthouse, it's a good day."

Fears of white reprisals against Negroes who register or encourage others to do so are not limited to Mississippi. Mr. King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) claims it can produce 150 documented cases of Negroes in Selma, Ala., losing their jobs for taking part in a vote drive earlier this year. In Crawfordville, Ga., Calvin Turner, a science teacher, claims he and five other Negro teachers lost ther jobs at the local Negro school this year because they had been active in an unusually successful voter registration drive.

"The ones who aren't registered see what happens to your jobs and they are afraid," says Mr. Turner. "We're trying to convince them that their right to vote is more important than a job, but it's hard."

It was probably fear of trouble that recently led a group of Negroes in the small east Georgia logging town of Lincolnton to go so far as to block a march on the courthouse led by SCLC staffers. "We like things as they are," insisted a leader of the Negroes obstructing the voting demonstration.

But some Negroes in Lincolnton feel that apathy plays as large a role as fear in keeping Negroes away from the polls in the town. "I'll have to agree that Negroes haven't shown much interest," says Welcome Mason, principal of the Lincoln County Training Center, a local Negro school. "They haven't registered for the same reason they haven't done anything else—lethargy and being too wrapped up in themselves to see past their nose." Lincolnton Negroes have made some registration progress lately—100 of them can vote now, up from only three in 1960. But those on the books are still only a fraction of the 1,300 Negroes of voting age in the town.

Information Program Urged

Advocates of stepped-up Government activity in the voting field don't limit their recommendations to the assignment of Federal registrars to areas that don't have them now. The Civil Rights Commission has urged that the Justice Department launch an information program to tell Negroes about voting rights. The commission also has called for greater Federal efforts to insure that, once registered, Negroes can actually vote without fear of intimidation.

"What it adds up to is that we are recommending that the Attorney General go into the affirmative field instead of just removing obstacles," says a member of the commission.

Civil rights workers here in Mississippi would have the Government go even further. Besides demanding Federal registrars in each of the state's 82 counties, they are asking that the registrars move around from one spot to another instead of waiting in an office for registrants to come to them. "Ideally, we want them to come along with us so they could sign people up as we talk to them, or else give us the forms and let us sign them up ourselves," says one voter registration worker.

Mr. Katzenbach has viewed the Government's role in regard to voting rights more narrowly than either the Civil Rights Commission or the registration workers in the South. Says a spokesman for the Attorney General: "He knows he's going to get shot at by the civil rights groups, but his response is that where Negroes want to be registered, we will see there are no obstacles in their paths. It's up to the civil rights groups to create enthusiasm and political activity among the Negroes."

There is considerable evidence that getting Southern Negroes registered is only half the battle for civil rights forces; bringing them to the point where they exercise their new power effectively can prove equally difficult.

Staying Home

This fall in Greenville, Miss., when the first Negro ran for the city council since Reconstruction, it was widely assumed that he would get the votes of nearly all the 1,100 eligible Negroes. But less than half the qualified Negroes turned out to vote at all. Hodding Carter, liberal publisher of the Delta Democrat Times in Greenville, who employs three Negroes at his country home just outside town, says: "Every time an election comes up, I have to practically take them by the scruff of the neck down to the polls."

Even in areas where Negroes gain an edge in registration, they may be unable to bring their weight to bear. This is the case in Crawfordville, the town in which the Negro teachers lost their jobs.

In Crawfordville and surrounding Taliaferro County, there are 925 registered Negroes, compared with 900 whites. But Mr. Turner, the sparkplug of the local Negro registration drive, indicates it will take years for Negroes to determine the outcome of an election or even to gain enough influence to cause the county school superintendent—an elective official—to hesitate to fire Negro teachers without an explanation.

The election machinery, Mr. Turner complains, is dominated by whites. "The elections are run by the Democratic executive committee, and it meets in the American Legion Hall, which is segregated, and we can't even get in," he says. He maintains that because the polls are manned entirely by whites, many Negroes are afraid to vote, while others meekly obey the instructions of white poll workers as to how to vote.

NEW YORK — Fischbach & Moore, Inc., a New York-based electrical contracting concern, said it agreed to acquire A. S. Schulman Electric Co., a Los Angeles electrical contractor, through an exchange of stock. Details weren't disclosed.

Selma, Ala. Drive: 1,300 Organized in 5 Weeks

SELMA, Ala. — The RWDSU's Southern drive has taken a huge forward step with the organization during the early part of July of majorities among 700 workers at three plants in this area. Added to the 600 workers organized in June, this brings the total in five weeks to 1,300.

Alabama Council Org. Henry Jenkins, who is heading the drives, declined to name the latest shops organized until NLRB petitions for elections are filed, but said that he expected to file shortly.

The union has now organized 1,800 workers in the Selma and Greensboro area over the past year, and the pace has been stepped up sharply in recent weeks. Many of these are Negro workers, who are seeking to bring the victories of the civil rights movement to their jobs.

The changing atmosphere in and around Selma was revealed also in an NLRB victory reached last month in which seven workers at a food service company received $1,950 in back pay, which had been denied them through discrimination for their union membership. (See Page 7 for details.)

'Workers Speaking Up'

"Workers are speaking up for their rights now," said Jenkins. "The union makes them feel strong."

The organizing drives are being nailed down with election results and — most important — contracts. The union won an election among the 100 employees of the Greensboro Packing Co. July 6 by a 45-17 vote, and signed a first contract for 60 members at the Henry Brick Co. in Selma.

Negotiations at Greensboro Packing, a packer of beef and pork products, are expected to begin the week of July 24. Robert Weaver, Alfonso Williams, Sara Holifield, David Lee Smith, James Gooden, Inez Lewis and Jenkins will bargain for the workers.

The Greensboro Packing drive started when workers at Massengale Poultry Co., where the RWDSU won an NLRB election in November and a contract in March, began talking to the Greensboro Packing workers.

The two plants are the only organized shops in Greensboro, a town of 2,200, and the county seat of Hale County.

Eddie Long and Jenkins headed the drive at the packing plant.

The union has NLRB petitions for elections pending at the U.&W. Manufacturing Co. in Selma, which employs 325 workers, and at Ames Bag and Packing Co. in Marion, which employs 140 workers.

Ames laid off 29 employees, all Negroes, after the union filed for an election June 6, and replaced them with white workers. The union has filed charges against the company with both the NLRB and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Attendance of the Ames workers at union meetings is high, and the employees are determined to bring in the union, Jenkins said.

At Henry Brick Co., the RWDSU won a first contract for 60 workers earlier this month.

The agreement provides a 20-cent across-the-board wage increase and a ten-cent adjustment for some classifications over the 30 months of the contract; seniority, up to two weeks of vacation and paid holidays for the first time, and other benefits.

The RWDSU members include carpenters, fork-lift operators, drivers, firemen and kiln men.

NEW ERA IN ALABAMA was symbolized by the Freedom March from Selma to Montgomery in March 1965. Richard Jackman of Local 29 in New York City (at left) was one of the marchers in the famous photo, printed all over the world. Civil rights movement has inspired workers in Selma area to organize into RWDSU.

Coalition

Don't Be Fooled by the Hate Peddlers

An Election Day Message to RWDSU Members
By President Max Greenberg

I am taking this opportunity to contact every member of our union to discuss a matter of vital concern to all of us. On November 8th, millions of Americans will be going to the polls—including many thousands of RWDSU-ers and members of their families.

One thing about the election disturbs me more than anything else: I am very fearful that many voters—including union members—will go into the polling booths on Election Day and vote their fears and hatreds rather than their hopes and common sense.

More than ever before, efforts are being made to use an ugly and dangerous weapon in our political life: the weapon of racial resentment and prejudice. In the Negro community as in the white community, cynical demagogues are seeking to widen the gap between the two groups and to set them at each other's throats.

A. Philip Randolph, whose adult life has been devoted to organizing workers and to the struggle for civil rights, has pointed out in a recent speech reprinted in the last issue of The Record how damaging both "black power" and "white backlash" are to Negroes and whites. I want to underscore what Phil Randolph has said by relating it to this year's elections.

In state after state, reactionary politicians are appealing to naked emotions, to hate and fear and racism, in an effort to stop progress and turn back the clock. They capitalized on riots in the Negro ghettoes this past summer to defeat a civil rights bill which would have guaranteed open, unsegregated housing.

But that wasn't all they defeated. These same forces were also able to filibuster to death the repeal of Section 14-B and thus deny workers in 19 "right-to-work" states the same union security enjoyed by workers in the other 31 states. These reactionary forces were able to stop a bill to permit picketing at construction sites. And they were able to kill a bill liberalizing unemployment benefits and setting uniform standards for unemployed workers to receive such benefits.

So we can see that even in this 89th Congress, with the largest liberal majority in more than 30 years, reactionary forces have been able to wreak havoc with social and labor legislation. Just imagine how much more damage they can do if they pick up 50 or 60 more seats in the House of Representatives, as they expect to do!

If the peddlers of hate could have their way, they wouldn't be satisfied merely with repealing the civil rights legislation enacted during the past six years. They would want to go on from there to wipe out Medicare, to enact new restrictions on labor, to turn back the clock on every piece of social legislation enacted since FDR's New Deal.

Two years ago, Barry Goldwater spoke out frankly and openly on his ultra-conservative program—and the American people rejected him and his right-wing views by the biggest majority ever registered in a presidential election. Today the reactionaries are much more clever and subtle. They conceal other objectives behind the mask of "white backlash."

But I believe the American people will refuse to be misled in 1966 any more than they were in 1964. I believe that white Americans and black Americans will, in overwhelming numbers, reaffirm their desire for progress, their faith in freedom and their belief in full equality for all peoples.

I share with A. Philip Randolph the conviction that Negroes will reject appeals made to them by demagogues who preach hatred and separatism. And I know that A. Philip Randolph shares with me — and with the overwhelming majority of trade unionists—the conviction that white Americans will reject the peddlers of racism and hate.

And so, as solemnly as I can, I urge every member of the RWDSU to vote on Election Day, to oppose racism and reaction and to vote for progress. Be guided by your own good judgment, and I'm sure your decision will be the correct one.

BESSEMER, ALABAMA

Founded September 9, 1887, by Henry F. DeBardeleben. Bessemer was named for Sir Henry Bessemer, the English scientist who invented a process for making steel. Bessemer was incorporated as a town in 1888, as a city in 1889. The 1960 census population of Bessemer was 33,500 (14,509 white, 18,982 colored, and 9 others). Present estimated population of Bessemer is 39,500.

Bessemer has a Commission form of government. The Commission is composed of Jess Lanier, President; Ed Porter, Police Department; Tom Ashley, Street Department. The Commissioners serve for four years.

The City Recorder (judge) is James Hamrick, who serves a four-year term.
The City Attorney is J. Howard McEniry, Jr.

The Sheriff of Jefferson County is Mel Bailey.
The Chief Deputy in charge of Bessemer Cut-Off is James Thompson.
The Deputy Probate Judge is Harris Moore.
The Bessemer Circuit Judges are Edward Bell and Gardner F. Goodwyn, Jr.
The Civil and Criminal Judge is Walter Briggis.
The Solicitor in Bessemer Cut-Off is James Hammond.

NEWS from the AFL-CIO

NA. 8-3870

FOR RELEASE ON DELIVERY

Following is the text of a special Labor Day broadcast made by AFL-CIO President George Meany over the Columbia Broadcasting System's radio network. The program will be carried by CBS at 7:35 p.m. EDT on Monday, September 5, 1966, but will be heard in Washington over Station WTOP at 11:45 p.m. EDT Sunday, September 4, 1966.

On this Labor Day, the domestic issue that is attracting the most attention in the newspapers, and in news broadcasts, is the national economy.

Every day there are stories about inflation, about the so-called wage "guidelines", about the federal budget and so on.

Most of us are not economists and find the special jargon that economists often use rather confusing. But there is one side of economics that we do understand, and that is the family budget.

The family budget is very much affected. The cost of living has been going up. Almost every family is feeling the pinch. So let's see who is responsible and what can be done about it.

One fact must be made clear at the start.

Prices are not being pushed up by wages.

This is not just a claim. It is a fact, proved by government statistics.

The part that wages play in prices is measured, not by hourly rates of pay, but by unit labor costs. That is, how much money is paid for the labor involved in every piece produced.

From 1960 through 1965, unit labor costs in manufacturing showed a decrease. For an item that sold for $10 in 1960, the cost of labor was $2. For that same item in 1965, the cost of labor was $1.96. If the price went up in those five years, it wasn't because of the cost of labor.

In the first six months of 1966, unit labor costs did creep up. They rose by one-tenth of one percent. But the wholesale prices of industrial products leaped 2.8%, or 28 times as much.

That's the story of inflation in 1966. It is a profit inflation, pure and simple.

Between 1960 and 1965, corporate profits soared 52 percent before taxes and 67 percent after payment of taxes. Dividend payments to stockholders rose 43 percent. But weekly take-home pay of factory workers increased only 21 percent, and in terms of buying-power, merely 13 percent.

And this situation continues today.

The classic causes of inflation do not exist today. There is no great accumulation of pent-up purchasing-power, competing for goods that are in short supply. There are no shortages of goods; there is no excess of purchasing-power. The pressures that push prices upward in a true inflation simply are not there.

But prices are going up anyway. That is what we mean by a profit inflation.

Now the Federal Reserve Board, which has the responsibility for monetary policy -- meaning the supply of money, and the cost of money -- claims it is trying to correct this inflation. But it has been using the wrong device at the wrong time. The Federal Reserve Board has repeatedly pushed up interest rates, so that they are now the highest in 40 years, and likely to go higher. In fact, the cost of money has gone up faster than any other cost -- 33 1/3%, or a full third, since last December.

This has made matters worse instead of better. It has not slowed down the profit inflation at all. But it has made the cost of living even higher.

Anyone who is in the market for a new house, already knows what I am talking about.

What is called the "prime" interest rate is now 6%. But that's the rate for the very biggest borrowers. That's not what the ordinary citizen pays. He pays more. On a home mortgage, for instance, a buyer is now asked to pay at least 6½%, against 5½% just a short time ago.

Maybe that doesn't sound like much. Well, listen to this: On a $20,000 mortgage over 25 years (the normal mortgage period), that 1% difference will cost an extra $3,660.

For the vast majority of wage and salary earners, $3,600 represents well over half a year's earnings. Moreoever, at that rate, the borrower pays out $40,500 over 25 years -- the interest payments of $20,500 are greater than the loan, itself.

Even then there may be more trouble. The lender may not accept a standard 10% down payment. He may demand much more. That is not easy, especially for young people buying their first home.

But the bankers can be choosy. With a "prime" interest rate of 6%, some small business loans now go for 10% or better.

And those higher rates to farmers and small businessmen hit consumers from another side. The high cost of money adds to the small businessman's total costs. He has to get the money by raising prices.

So it is not just home-buyers who are feeling the pinch. It is pinching everyone -- except the bankers. They are doing very well indeed.

The full impact of the latest rise in interest rates has already been felt in one area -- felt by those buying a car.

Let's ignore the sharp practices that are often involved in dealer financing, and just take a standard bank loan on a new car, amounting to $3,000 for three years.

The New York Times on August 24 reported that the effective rate on new car loans at the big New York City banks is now 9½ percent. Of course, this is the lowest rate; borrowing from finance companies is much more expensive.

But at this lowest rate, a man financing a $3,000 automobile over a three-year period is now going to pay $498.54 in interest. That's $89 more than he would have paid a year ago. He gets nothing more in a car. It's the bankers who get that extra $89.

This is the sort of thing that is hitting the family. High interest rates are being translated into price boosts all along the line from the farmer, industrial producer and builder to the consumer. They are also being translated into increased rents, which are already too high.

Leaving the family budget for a moment, it is also hitting our hopes for a better society. For instance, between December 1965 and March 1966, the New York Public Housing Authority found that the interest rate it would have to pay on its bonds had gone up.

Let's look at what that means -- not in terms of percentages but in terms of housing units that could not be built, just because of the high cost of money.

A total of 1400 apartments -- homes for 5,500 people -- could not be built. The bankers got that money -- the people did not get their homes.

And since March 1966 the cost of money has gone up and up and up.

These are the highlights of the problems that affect us all. Let us look very briefly at the very real threat they pose to the general prosperity, and then suggest some solutions.

The home-building industry in the United States is at a standstill -- a full-fledged depression. It is at a standstill because of the tight-money, high-interest policies of the Federal Reserve Board.

The whole economy is in danger because profits and interest rates have risen enormously while wages have barely kept pace with the cost of living, and in many instances have lagged behind it. An expanding economy -- an economy where productive capacity is soaring, where manhour output is breaking records -- demands a comparable growth in the real buying-power of American consumers.

We in the labor movement cannot understand those on the management side whose whole lives are devoted to producing more and more, at lower and lower costs, but who never seem to consider that without full employment at good wages, there simply will not be enough customers to buy what they produce.

Now let's talk about remedies -- remedies that need to be applied before it is too late.

First, interest rates must be rolled back. This will require Congressional action under the leadership of the President.

Second, a big source of today's profit inflation is a capital goods boom resulting from a 7% tax credit for business -- in effect, a subsidy for new business investment. It should be repealed. If there ever was a reason for this device, the reason no longer exists. On the contrary, this handout to business stokes the fires of inflation.

Third, consumer purchasing-power -- the foundation of the American economic system -- must be improved. In the last year, there has been hardly any increase at all in the buying-power of workers' take-home pay.

Fourth, pending improvements in minimum wages, unemployment compensation and other income-raising measures should promptly be enacted into law.

Fifth, the concept of public investment in America at every level -- education, the war on poverty, conservation, recreation, housing and all the rest -- should be continued and expanded.

Finally, it must be recognized that free collective bargaining is the one most effective instrument for insuring a proper balance between the economic equities of labor and management.

In this country, more than in any other, organized workers know they have a stake in the enterprise that employs them. They know they have a stake in its profitability. They know they have a stake in its competitive position. But they also know the needs and the equities that involve themselves.

This is why collective bargaining is so successful in the United States. This is why 98% of the collective bargaining agreements are hammered out, year after year, without any work stoppages, or any name-calling in the press.

Difficulties are more apt to arise when well-meaning outsiders -- whether it is the government or anyone else -- come along with a preconceived formula, that is supposed to fit every case.

Now suppose there is a genuine national emergency, so declared by the President. We say that -- if that happens -- then prices, profits, dividends, wages and everything else should be brought under control through measures that will guarantee equality of sacrifice by everyone.

The labor movement, which has always cooperated 100% under national emergency conditions in the past, will do so again if they ever arise again.

But until that happens, we will concentrate on protecting the family budget and protecting the United States from an economic disaster brought on by a profit inflation.

This is our duty as we see it; our duty to all Americans, not just to our members. On this Labor Day, we renew our determination to fulfill that duty to the utmost of our abilities.

Labor Men File For Seats On City Council

Durham Labor Jnl. 4/25/57

Two members of organized labor are among the candidates for seats on the Durham City Council.

Charles J. Wiesner, a member of Machinist Local 721 and an employe of Liggett and Myers Tobacco Company, filed as a candidate for one of the at-large seats.

Weisnei, a native of Durham and a graduate of Lowes Grove High School, is the son of Mrs. W. H. Weisner and the late Mr. Wiesner of Lowes Grove. He is married to the former Jewel Parrot of Gastonia. They have one child and reside at 1131 eventh Ave. in Wellons Village.

WEISNER

He holds the rank of Major in the Civil Air Patrol and is presently serving as Commander of the Durham Unit of the CAP. His duties include being rescue officer in charge of operations for the State CAP organizations.

A veteran of two years overseas service, Wiesner is a member of the Advisory Council for Civil Defense here, and is a member of the Ground Observer Corp. He is chairman of the local American Red Cross first air committee, and is an active first aid instructor.

L. A. Dowdy, a member and former president of Durham Typographical Union No. 125, is a lifelong resident of Durham. He has been a printer on the Morning Herald for the past 24 years and is at present serving as foreman of the Herald composing room.

He is married to the former Nell Sue Branch of Alamance County. They have two teenage daughters. In announcing Dowdy said, "I make no promise except that if I am elected, I will do my best to serve all the citizens of Durham as one who is proud to live here." Dowdy filed for the first ward seat now being held by Floyd Fletcher.

Other late candidates include three young men who have been active in the civic life of the community in recent years.

Charles L. Steel, manager of the Steel Music Company and a graduate of Duke University, filed as a Candidate-at-large.

A major in the Marine Corps Reserve, Steel won the Presidential Citation while serving with the 5th Marine Division on Iwo

Right To Work The "Big Issue" In 1958

While the Space Age projects still predominate the news headlines action on the Right to Work issue is rapidly spreading at the State level. Not only are battles shaping up through previously organized groups, but new groups have been formed for action this year and others are under consideration. Our information at Press time on the present State activity for 1958 follows:

CALIFORNIA—In a surprise movement an initiative right to work measure was filed with the Attorney General of California on January 8. The measure, filed by an employee group known as the Citizens Committee for Democracy in Labor Unions, would provide that "All men should be free to elect voluntarily whether or not to join a labor organization," and will be submitted to the voters at the November elections if qualified. The signatures of 322,429 registered voters will be required to qualify the measure.

Reports show that Howard Wyatt, a member of Local 626 of the Teamsters Union, is Executive Secretary of the Committee. According to Wyatt, the Committee was organized last year by union members who have become disgusted and aroused by the extent of corruption existing within the union movement. Wyatt emphasized that the measure his committee seeks is not "anti-labor" or "anti-union". As proof of his statement he quoted from the proposed measure: "Nothing in this section shall be construed to deny the right of an employee to be represented in collective bargaining by a labor organization."

Present address of the Committee is listed as P.O. Box 32055, Los Angeles 32, California. Wyatt says that as soon as sufficient funds are available an office will be opened.

The Citizen's Committee for Voluntary Unionism, 609 South Grand Avenue, Los Angeles 17, has been working toward such an initiative for some time. Leonard D. Keefer, Executive Secretary for that Committee stated that the proposal of the employee group is in line with the thinking of his Committee and added, "We'll urge everybody to get out a favorable vote."

COLORADO—Following a series of meetings of interested groups a Right to Work Committee has been incorporated and is under way in Colorado. All necessary papers have been filed with the State Government, setting up the State Committee and the initiative measure to be presented for a vote in the November election.

"Americans Must Have the Right, but not Be Compelled to Join Labor Unions"

The headquarters office has been opened in Denver from which petitions are to be distributed and a full-time educational program carried on across the state. County groups will be formed as the program progresses.

Interested Colorado citizens are requested to contact the Colorado Right to Work Committee, 1724 Stout Street, Denver, Colorado.

IDAHO— Needing only 23,000 petition signatures to place an initiative on the ballot in the November election there is little doubt that citizens will have an opportunity to decide the right to work issue in Idaho. The Idaho Freedom to Work Committee plans to procure 200,000 signatures, not only assuring that the issue will be voted on, but impressing all concerned with the number favoring such legislation.

Indicating the general interest, such organizations as the Idaho Branch of the Associated General Contractors; Idaho Wool Growers Association; Mountain Rock Grange; Pomona Grange; Idaho State Grange and the Idaho Farm Bureau Federation have passed resolutions supporting right to work.

Address inquiries to Mr. Fred Smith, Executive Secretary, Idaho Freedom to Work Committee, Inc., 415 Idaho Building, Boise, Idaho.

KANSAS— With the right to work initiative already set for appearance on the ballot in the November election, the Kansas Committee is busy with a campaign of arousing the interest of the voters.

This operation requires the distribution of materials outlining the evils of compulsion on a broad scale, involving considerable expense in printing as well as handling and mailing costs. The scope of the work will be governed by the degree of response to appeals for support.

Those desiring to augment this program should contact Kansans for the Right to Work, Box 3038, S.E. Station, Wichita, Kansas.

KENTUCKY—Assurance that a full scale right to work campaign will be made in Kentucky is given in the announcement of the formation of a new committee under the name Kentuckians For Right-To-Work, Inc. Address of the group is 250 Marion E. Taylor Building, Louisville 2, Kentucky.

An eleven man board of directors listed in the articles of incorporation includes business, farm and labor representatives from nine Kentucky communities. A Shelby County farmer, Winford Thomas, was elected as president by directors of the Committee at a meeting in Louisville.

A Kentucky Labor Committee for Right-To-Work was previously organized and reported in our October-November Newsletter. The two groups will cooperate though functioning separately.

LOUISIANA—Passage of right to work legislation in Louisiana during 1958 is predicted by State Senator Jackson B. Davis of Shreveport.

Davis said he will introduce the right to work bill as soon as the Legislature convenes. He said he will introduce two measures, one a simple bill and the other a constitutional amendment requiring a vote of the people.

A right to work law, passed in the 1954 Legislature, was repealed during the 1956 sessions. The Legislators passed a similar law applying to agricultural workers only during the same session.

MONTANA—Further confirming the spirit of freedom of the West a new Right to Work movement has been organized in Montana. Incorporation papers filed with the Secretary of State lists the group under the name of the Equal Opportunity League, Inc., with headquarters in Billings.

Officers named by the directors are Carl Smith, Olive, President; Keith Williams, Bozeman, Vice President; and Dayton Persons, Billings, Sec'ty-Treas. Headquarters offices are to be set up in Billings under full time supervision of Mr. Persons. For the present all inquiries should be addressed to the Equal Opportunity League, Inc., P.O. Box 348, Billings, Montana.

An initiative measure has been prepared to be placed on the ballot in the November elections upon the securing of qualifying petitions. The petitions will be circulated by volunteer groups set up in the various counties. A broad program of distribution of educational materials is planned by the headquarters office.

OHIO—With the proposed right to work amendment now filed and approved by the Attorney General and Secretary of State the petition campaign in Ohio is ready to move forward rapidly.

The amendment was approved by Attorney General William Saxbe on January 13 and filed with the Secretary of State, Ted W. Brown on January 17 for preparation of petitions. The petitions have now been turned over to the printers and are to be ready for delivery on February 6.

Both the Ohio Labor Committee for Right to Work and the Ohioans for Right to Work are prepared to go into action immediately to obtain the 354,210 signatures necessary to place the issue on the November ballot.

WASHINGTON—Undaunted by the approximately 2 to 1 loss in the referendum of 1956, a new Right to Work Committee has been formed in Washington and a right to work initiative measure filed to place the right to work issue on the ballot in the November elections.

The 1956 right to work measure, Initiative 198, received a total vote of 329,653. Signatures of 90,319 voters will be required to qualify the new measure, Initiative 202.

Response from local groups which were active in the 1956 campaign is very encouraging. As added encouragement, the Fifth Congressional District Republican Club passed a resolution favoring voluntary union membership at a meeting on January 4, 1958 in Spokane.

Those desiring to assist may contact the Committee by writing Mr. Ashley E. Holden, Executive Director, Citizens' Committee for Voluntary Unionism, 306 Second and University Building, Seattle 1, Washington.

RIGHT TO WORK AD CAMPAIGN UNDER WAY ACROSS NATION

Nearly seventy-five newspapers are preparing to carry the National Right to Work Committee ad. This is the new square ad measuring three columns wide by eight inches in depth, titled "FORCED UNION MEMBERSHIP . . . Steals Your Freedom!" While virtually all of the states are represented in the long list of newspapers running the ad there is more activity in the areas which do not have Right to Work laws.

The greatest concentration of the ads will appear in the heavily populated urban belts away from the city centers. These belts run across the Middle Atlantic States, through the Great Lakes region, down the Mississippi river valley and into the Southwest. Among the states in the South and Southwest where the ad campaign is receiving encouraging support are Kansas, Oklahoma, Arkansas, Louisiana and New Mexico.

Response has been coming in more slowly from the Pacific Coastal states. It is perhaps, too early to give a fair picture of the support of the ad program. Requests for the mats are still coming in from members and newspapers as a result of the general letter on the campaign sent out on January 15, 1958. Western state requests have just begun to come in and increased activity in the campaign is expected from there shortly.

Hometown America is well represented in the requests and in the return of ad coupons clipped from the daily papers where the ad has already run. Returns on hand from Bridgeport, Connecticut; Memphis, Tennessee; and New Orleans are high on the list of tallies showing popular public support and sympathy for the Right to Work principle.

Continued enthusiastic support is desired and needed on this project. This preview of what is believed to be an impressive result in the ad campaign should not lull anyone into feeling that the job has been successfully concluded. It is hoped that with the support of the membership a full success story may be told in a later edition.

NEW PUBLICATIONS ON THE RIGHT TO WORK ISSUE

"LABOR UNION MONOPOLY, A CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER," by Donald R. Richberg, 180 pages, is offered in bookstores at $3.50 per copy. Now, however, arrangements have been made by the Constitution and Free Enterprise Foundation, Inc., for mass distribution at a low price in a paper-bound edition.

Mr. Richberg, a member of the Advisory Board of the National Right to Work Committee, has earned a position of esteem as a lifetime fighter for the legitimate rights of labor. But now, after twenty years, he shows how the labor movement has been misused by the labor bosses, in cooperation with a compliant government, to establish a dictatorial power over the American economy and to further socialistic objectives.

Copies may be obtained from the Constitution and Free Enterprise Foundation, Inc., 210 East 43rd Street, New York 17, New York. Single copies, $1; 2 to 25 copies, 90¢ each; 40 to 90 copies, 85¢ each; 100 to 600 copies, 80¢ each; 1,000 or more copies, 75¢ each.

"VOLUNTARY UNIONISM FOR FREE AMERICANS," a 32 page pamphlet by Rev. John E. Coogan, S.J., Chairman, Department of Sociology, University of Detroit, published by the National Right to Work Committee, is just off the press.

In addition to outlining the clear moral obligation of society to support the precept of individual freedom of choice, Father Coogan concisely and forcefully brings to light the many evils of compulsory unionism.

Copies may be obtained by writing the National Right to Work Committee at 1025 Connecticut Avenue, N.W., Washington 6, D.C. Single copies, Free; 5 copies, $1; 25 copies, $4; 100 copies, $15.

Union Unity Works Out

Three short years of unity have shown that "there is no worthy goal that is beyond the power of the members of organized labor in the United States," IAM Vice President Elmer Walker declared this week.

THE 13,500,000 members of AFL-CIO affiliated unions have become more effective politically, have cut down wasteful raiding, and have made a good start toward cleaning up the small amount of union corruption, he told delegates to the second annual convention of IAM District 146 at Dallas, Tex. Mr. Walker delivered the keynote address to union employees of Braniff Airways, Trans Texas Airways, Slick Airways and Central Airline.

Here are some excerpts from Mr. Walker's speech:

ON LEGISLATION—"There is no doubt that unity has strengthened the effectiveness of labor in its legislative and political activities.

"Where there used to be a number of alleged labor spokesmen, often talking at cross purposes, there is now a unified voice. This unity of purpose and voice had a large part to play in blocking restrictive labor legislation during the recent Congress and in winning such victories as higher social security benefits."

ON RAIDS—"The most tangible and one of the most important results of merger has been a marked decrease in inter-union raiding.

"Four years ago when the AFL and CIO were exploring the possibilities of merger, the Joint Unity Committee did a survey on the record of raiding for the years 1951-1953.

"The Committee found that over that three-year period affiliates of the then separate federations spent nearly $12,000,000 in raiding each other's membership. That figures out to $4,000,000 a year—$4,000,000 that could and should have been used for constructive activities.

"Merger has done much to cut down this shameful and harmful waste of membership's dues. Just about a month ago President (George) Meany of the AFL-CIO released some comparative figures.

"They showed that the number of employees in the raided bargaining units in 1957 was only 7 per cent of the 1953 total."

ON CLEAN-UP—"The membership of the AFL-CIO was cut markedly by the expulsion of the Teamsters, the Bakers, and the Laundry Workers at the 1957 convention. The total loss amounted to some 1,600,000 members with the Teamsters accounting for the greater part.

"The Federation's willingness to sacrifice . . . membership for principle marks it as unique among American institutions."

Chapman Speaks On Automation

IAM Grand Lodge Rep. Lee Chapman explained the IAM's views on automation to 29 vocational education instructors recently. Chapman spoke at the University of Illinois at Bloomington where he and Dr. Herbert Northrup, General Electric Co. consultant, led a panel discussion on "Automation."

Earl Melton Retires, Served for 45 Years

IAM Vice President Earl Melton of Chicago retired this week after more than 45 years as an active IAM member, representative and officer.

His friends, both at Washington, D. C., and Chicago, honored Mr. Melton and his wife, "Susie," with testimonial dinners and gifts designed to make their new leisure more enjoyable.

AT WASHINGTON, fellow members of the IAM Executive Council helped fete the Meltons at a party that featured tributes by both IAM President Al Hayes and General Secretary-Treasurer Eric Peterson.

At Chicago, IAM District 8 and the Railroad Machinists' General Chairmen's Association planned a dinner dance in honor of the Meltons.

Mr. Melton, back in good health after undergoing operations for removal of cataracts earlier this year, announced that he and his wife plan to devote some of their new leisure to an extended vacation trip around the country.

THE IAM vice president's retirement, on Oct. 8, his 65th birthday, is in accordance with the IAM Constitution which requires that all persons covered by the Grand Lodge pension plan must retire at age 65.

Born Oct. 8, 1893, on a farm near Binnsville, Miss., and educated in the public schools of Meridian, Miss., Earl Melton became a boomer machinist after completing his apprenticeship on the Mobile and Ohio Railroad in 1914.

He traveled through much of the West, working in steel plants and copper mines, as well as on the railroads. During World War I, he worked at the Naval Gun Factory, Washington, D. C., returning to Meridian after the war as shop committee member and financial secretary of IAM Lodge 312 and, later, as executive board member of IAM District 4.

MR. MELTON'S Grand Lodge service dates back to 1929 when he was first appointed a Grand Lodge representative. He has been a general vice president since 1940, serving in the Great Lakes territory until 1945 and in the Southern territory until 1949.

During the past nine years, as vice president assigned to the railroads, Mr. Melton has played an active role in negotiations for the 40-hour week, wage increases, the union shop and a health and welfare program for railroad employees and their dependents. During this period, Mr. Melton represented the IAM on the Railway Labor Executives' Association and on the executive council of the Railway Employees Department, AFL-CIO.

LAST MONTH, Mr. Melton met with representatives of 17 other non-operating railroad unions to prepare for upcoming negotiations with the railroad industry on improvement of working rules.

Mr. Melton's duties in this field and on the IAM Executive Council will now be taken over by Joseph W. Ramsey, who was elected general vice president last August.

IAM Shop Card Up at Bellingham

Al's Signal Service at Bellingham, Wash., has posted an IAM shop card to let customers know that IAM members do their work, W. Y. Armstrong, business representative Lodge 239, reports.

MACHINIST CHART

WHERE OUR MONEY GOES

For 50 years Grand Lodge has been reporting regularly to IAM members where our money goes. Each month the General Secretary-Treasurer has sent financial reports to all lodge recording secretaries. The chart above was taken from the July report just issued. The chart shows that the heaviest expense, 31 per cent that month, was incurred to help employees improve wages and working conditions through organization and negotiation. Benefits paid directly to members (mostly strike benefits and death benefits) accounted for 17 per cent. Services to members and lodges, like those of the Research, Education, and Medical Departments, and publications including THE MACHINIST took another 17 per cent.

Iowans Bone up on Arbitration

More than 30 IAM members learned IAM policies and practices on arbitration of grievances at a recent school at Des Moines, Iowa, Clarence F. Dunn, recording secretary of Lodge 831, Cedar Rapids, reports.

CHARLES R. ASK, vice president and education chairman of the Iowa State Council of Machinists, arranged the program with the help of John Brumm, IAM education director.

The movies, "Arbitration in Action" and "The Grievance," were shown, and after each movie Grand Lodge Reps. Tom Hansen and Floyd Smith answered question. Jack Flagler, from the University of Iowa, spoke on "An Arbitrator Views Union Practices in Arbitration."

ARE YOU REGISTERED TO VOTE? That's the big question that IAM members in New York State are asking this week. With the final day for registration set for Oct. 11, the Empire State members are shooting to get every possible employee registered—together with his wife and any other voting-age members of the family. The lodges are following an intricate blueprint for a citizenship campaign worked out by the New York State Council of Machinists in cooperation with the Machinists Non-Partisan Political League. The good citizenship plan calls for checking the name of every union member against registration lists. Then, for those members found to be not yet registered, there is an int

HOBBY CORNER

Junior's Piggy Bank May Hide Coin Find

COIN COLLECTING families have found it useful to keep an eye on Junior's piggy bank when he transfers his pennies, nickels, dimes and quarters to the savings account. Occasionally a sought-after coin has turned up which is worth more than its denomination.

Numismatists will tell you that a Lincoln penny of 1909 with the legend S-VDB might be worth $40 and more if it's in top condition. Only 484,000 such pennies were made. The VDB stands for Victor D. Brenner who designed the coin. S stands for San Francisco mint which started striking coins in 1854.

The San Francisco mint is one of three U. S. mints still in operation. The other two are at Denver, designated by a D on coins, which started operating in 1906, and at Philadelphia, established in 1793 and recognized by a P. Other mints operated at various places and various times, but for limited periods only.

Here are news from IAM collectors who wish to trade, buy or sell coins:

Howard D. Loy, IAM Lodge 828, 131 Paxton Ave., Elm Grove, W. Va.: Will pay five cents for any Indian Head cent with legible date and legend.

Pearl E. Czech, IAM Lodge 1893, 9218 E. Broadway, Temple City, Calif.: Wanted 1909-VDB, 1909, 1909-SVDB, 1909-S Lincoln pennies, also old silver dollars, and proof sets. Other coins bought, state condition and price.

R. E. Schneider, IAM Lodge 2192, 4215 54th St., San Diego 15, Calif.: Wanted, 1914-D Lincoln penny to complete collection. Send postcard stating condition and price.

F. A. Gorny, IAM Lodge 113, 4730 W. Superior St., Chicago 44, Ill.: Will sell only to IAM members collection of about 1,100 coins at reasonable prices. Include Lincoln, Indian Head pennies, 1900 to 1939, all mints, Mercury and Barber dimes 1886 to 1935 all mints, also quarters 1883 to 1936, all mints.

A. F. Gransie, IAM Lodge 1933, 5018 E. 17th St., Tucson, Ariz.: For sale or exchange for American coins, approximately 400 foreign coins, representing about 50 foreign cities and countries, all different denominations, mostly of bronze, copper and silver, also foreign paper money and 19th and 20th century coins of the World books.

Mrs. Eva Orsini, IAM Lodge 350, 152 Standish St., Hartford, Conn.: For sale Indian Head pennies 1862, 1863, 1865, 1881, 1890, 1892, 1899, 1901, 1907. Flying Eagle pennies 1857, 1868. Large pennies 1852, 1844, 2-cent pieces 1864, 1865, 1868, 20-cent piece 1877, Columbia Exposition half dollar 1893.

Edward Krauss, IAM Lodge 295, 88-40 242 St., Bellerose 26, N. Y.: Wanted Morgan dimes 1892 to 1900 all mints, 1900 to 1909 in S mints, Lincoln pennies 1909 to 1927 in S mints.

Le Roy J. Knettle, IAM Lodge 175, 619 W. Locust Street, York, Pa.: Old coins bought and sold. Send your want or sale list.

Donald Priest, IAM Lodge 409, 41 Main, Fairfield, Me.: Would like to exchange American coins for Canadian, or will buy. Would like to hear from Canadian collectors.

William N. Landry, IAM Lodge 702, 1893 N.W. 17th Street, Miami, Fla.: Am trying to complete my collection in Liberty Head and Buffalo nickels. Write giving condition and price in first letter.

Anthony De Paolo, IAM Lodge 442, 302-B Monterey St., China Lake, Calif.: For sale Lincoln pennies in very good condition 1950 S-D, 1952-D, 1953-S-D, 1954-D-(8), 1954-S, 1955-(6) D and (12) 1955-S, 1956-(3) D, 1957-(5) D, 1958-(4) D. Or will swap for Washington quarters 1932 S and D.

George H. Smith, IAM Lodge, 1987, R.F.D. 32-C, Central Islip, N. Y.: I need all scarce dated Lincoln and Indian Head pennies, have unc. Lincoln cents to sell. I buy, sell and trade all coins.

Albert J. Lemire, IAM Lodge 1606, 462 Dexter St., Central Falls, R. I.: Have several U. S. and foreign coins which I will sell or trade for certain Lincoln pennies, 1827 half dollar, 1912 V nickel, 1915 Indian nickel, Indian cents 1897, 1907, dimes 1917, 1923 S, French 5-francs 1829 L, Belgian 1873 and many others.

THE MACHINIST publishes this column periodically as a service to IAM coin collectors. Notices appear in order received as space permits. Print or type the wording you want, limiting yourself to 50 words or less, including name, lodge number and complete address. Send to Hobby Corner, 909 Machinist Bldg., Washington 6, D. C. THE MACHINIST staff does not include a numismatist, and is therefore unable to answer inquiries about coins.

Bragging Bee Adds More Good Prizes

New prizes have been added to the list of contest trophies in the IAM Fisherman's Bragging Bee, Joseph M. Kane, business representative for IAM District 64, Providence, R. I., reports. Brown & Sharpe Mfg. Co. has presented handsome cuff links to match the micrometer tie clasps it provided earlier as third place prizes. For IAM fishermen the chance to enter stories in the Bragging Bee ends Oct. 15.

Top prize is an official $49.50 IAM 10 kt. gold IAM ring set with a black onyx. Second prize is a beautiful hand-tooled leather wallet showing a fisherman playing a leaping fish; third prizes are the tie clasps and matching cuff links; and for honorable mention the Union Sportsman will award gold-plated IAM lapel emblems.

IAM members and members of their immediate families should mail true fishing stories, no more than 250 words in length, to Fisherman's Bragging Bee, 909 Machinists Bldg., Wash. 6, D. C. Include name, address and lodge number. Letters must be postmarked no later than Oct. 15.

Labor, Big Business and Inflation

Blaming labor for inflation has become a favorite parlor game (and speech topic) for politicians and corporation propagandists. Last week labor published the facts. The Industrial Union Department of the AFL-CIO published a well-documented 34-page booklet that explains in detail just what are the actual factors that have been fueling our current inflation. Here are some key excerpts from "Labor, Big Business and Inflation":

FIVE OR TEN YEARS AGO it was popular in big business circles to blame inflation on the Roosevelt and Truman New Deal-Fair Deal "spending programs." As prices have continued to move up under a Republican administration, big business groups have looked for a new scapegoat in order to shift attention away from their own role in raising prices. To no one's surprise, they have singled out unions.

The vicious campaign to persuade the public that labor is responsible for inflation is also a part of big business' now apparently never ending effort to discredit and weaken unions.

Actually, labor has been a victim of inflation and not the cause of it. Certainly, it has not profited from inflation. Throughout the entire period of rising prices in the postwar decade, labor's gains were less than it had a right to expect.

Labor Expectations

What did labor have a right to expect? It is just about unanimously agreed that as our economy develops, all groups in it ought to share in the increasing fruits of industry. If our ability to produce goods and services increases, everyone ought to be able to consume more than they consumed before. Economists call this sharing in increased productivity.

What gains has labor actually made during the period of inflation which has troubled the country since the end of World War II?

Productivity Increase

Real wages (that is, wages adjusted to reflect changes in the purchasing power of the dollar) plus the added cost of fringe benefits such as pensions and hospital plans rose 35.2 per cent between 1947 and 1957.

During the same period, productivity went up 37 per cent.

In other words, total real compensation for employees, including wages and fringe benefits, has not kept pace with the rising output of the economy as a whole.

Also, between 1947 and 1957, unit wage costs went up 15.7 per cent. At the same time, the industrial price level jumped 25.6 per cent.

The real blame for the present inflation should be placed upon the shoulders of the giant corporations that exercise their great economic power to raise prices and widen their profit margins. These corporations have reaped the benefits of technological advances without translating the increased productivity into lower prices for consumers as well as higher wages for workers.

For example, three leading companies in each of 10 key industries have increased their share of corporate profits (after taxes) in all manufacturing from 17.5 per cent in 1947 to 31.1 per cent in 1957.

Big Business Control

The smaller manufacturing companies were not faring nearly so well during the same ten-year period. While the 30 top companies were increasing their rate of profit, the rate of profit on investment for all other manufacturing companies fell from 16.1 per cent to 11.5 per cent.

More and more people are beginning to realize that, unless the great corporations which control so large a share of economic power in the United States can be persuaded to act with greater consideration for the public interest, American economic life will be subject to continuing inflationary pressures.

The Candidates and the Program

The Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America firmly believes that a major role of the union and of its members is active participation in politics to strengthen the nation's economy and protect the general public from harmful legislation sponsored by selfish interests.

This year, as in the past, the ACWA has endorsed candidates for Congress, governorships, and other public offices. Some are incumbents, some are seeking a particular office for the first time. All of them have compiled good records, either in office or in some other phase of public life.

In the following pages of "The Advance" you will find the names and biographical sketches of some of these endorsees. Unfortunately, space limitation prevented us from using the names and sketches of all the endorsed men and women. Nevertheless, all of these people, we believe, are best suited to spark a new era of liberal legislation and governmental policies that will revitalize our sick economy and regain the confidence of our friends abroad.

And there is a dire need for such sparking. Since the Republican Party took control of the Federal Government over five and a half years ago, there has been a steady rise in the cost of living, a recession that has not been solved, and a steady decline in our prestige in the world. Although the Democratic Eighty-fifth Congress created a record of accomplishments in some areas, it was balked by the Eisenhower Administration time after time on many issues, such as tax reductions for the low- and middle-income groups, through threats of veto and other means.

To offset a do-nothing White House position, it is mandatory that the Democratic majority be increased substantially in the forthcoming Eighty-sixth Congress. It can be done through the election of liberal candidates who have the union's endorsement.

What are some of these needs that the Eighty-sixth Congress must take care of? There are more than a dozen basic ones that organized labor considers essential to recreating prosperity and removing inequities and restrictions surrounding many human beings. They follow:

- Reduce federal income taxes for low- and middle-income families to relieve them of an extraordinarily heavy tax burden and thus channel these tax savings into purchasing power; close loopholes in the tax structure favoring certain private interests, such as oil and insurance companies; reduce excise taxes and exempt from taxation contributions to federal retirement systems.
- Extend coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act to some 10 million not now protected and increase the minimum wage to at least $1.25 an hour.
- Overhaul the Taft-Hartley Act to restore justice and equity to both labor and management; repeal Section 14 (b) that gives states the privilege of passing anti-labor "right-to-work" laws.
- Overhaul the social security system to provide for hospital, nursing home, and surgical care for those receiving benefits.
- Take positive steps to safeguard clean unions from racketeers and improper activities in both labor and management.
- Modernize the unemployment benefits system to provide more equitable payments and length of benefits in the states; provide increases in retirement and unemployment benefits for railroad workers.
- Expand the housing program to provide more low-cost public housing and eradicate slums.
- Provide federal aid for education to offset the growing schoolroom shortage and to attract competent teachers.
- Improve civil rights legislation to insure equal treatment for all citizens and equal protection of the laws.
- Liberalize the immigration laws, including modification of the quota and national origin systems.
- Authorize self-financing for the Tennessee Valley Authority, and expand the program to apply atomic energy to peacetime uses.
- Enact an area redevelopment program similar to that passed by the Eighty-fifth Congress and vetoed by President Eisenhower.
- Establish a trade adjustment program for industries and workers adversely affect by imports.
- Adopt fringe benefits for federal employees comparable to those in private industry, and recognize their right to organize and bargain collectively through their unions.
- Provide federal workmen's compensation and safety standards in atomic energy installations.

You can help enact that comprehensive program by voting for and electing the candidates we believe will sincerely work for its passage.

You and Political Action

One of the key resolutions unanimously adopted at the Amalgamated's twenty-first biennial convention last May in Atlantic City was that dealing with political action. With the election campaign in high gear and election day, November 4, approaching, every Amalgamated member should read and reread that resolution, for it spells out in detail the problems facing the nation and how Amalgamated members can help meet them through their power of the ballot. The resolution follows:

Six years of Republican control of the national Administration have left us virtually leaderless at a time when we are faced with serious crises at home and abroad, and with a rising anti-labor tide threatening many of the gains of organized labor. For almost a year the nation has been sinking into recession. Unemployment steadily is increasing, purchasing power is declining while the cost of living is rising. We have tools at hand to combat the recession, tax relief to restore consumer purchasing power, additional social welfare legislation to help relieve the unemployed, and extensive building programs to put the unemployed back to work.

In the face of this crisis the Administration, and their allies in Congress, have failed to act. They are more anxious to maintain the status quo than to take the bold and dynamic steps to put the nation back on the path to prosperity. The same forces who helped bring on the recession through their tight money policies and high interest rates have resisted tax relief.

Major Attack Opened on Organized Labor

The same anti-labor politicians who threatened earlier in the year to cut back the nation's welfare programs are now dragging their heels when the need is obvious to shore up such programs. The same short-sighted officeholders who failed to institute school and road-building programs in earlier times are still holding back when the need is greater than ever.

At the same time that the Federal Government lacks courageous leadership, less scrupulous forces are mounting a major attack on the rights and gains of labor. Emboldened by a climate poisoned by the McClellan Committee, the professional labor haters and their allies are promoting legislation which would seriously cripple labor's strength. Across the land these forces are pouring money and manpower into the task of putting misnamed "right-to-work" laws on the books of every state.

It is in times like these that workers, as union members and as citizens, must redouble their efforts to bring back to our government a leadership capable of putting into effect a vigorous program of policies and action designed to cope with the hardships created by depression and put our economy back on the road to economic growth.

In the 1958 Congressional elections, labor could do much to help elect men of vision and purposefulness to both Houses and to a score of state capitols, men who will not be satisfied with drift and indecision, who will choose the public welfare over private greed and selfishness, who have faith in our expanding economy and our even higher standard of living and who will fight for legislation which will make them possible.

Good Candidates Need People's Support

Men like these, both incumbents and candidates for office, are available if they can be assured of support. Since they are denied the support of big business, labor must join hands with farmers, consumers and citizens everywhere to assure full registration of all voters and full backing for liberal candidates.

The need for greater activity to insure that our members are eligible to vote is particularly important. Our political and educational activities can succeed only if an overwhelming percentage of our membership is eligible to vote. The job of assuring full registration of our members is a difficult one, but is nevertheless a job we must pursue with all the energy at our command.

Over the years, labor's participation in govern-

Harriman for Governor, Hogan for U.S. Senator

Governor Averell Harriman has given New York State outstanding leadership since his election to that post in 1954. Because of his fine record, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America is wholeheartedly supporting Harriman, the Democratic-Liberal candidate, for re-election.

Running on the same ticket is labor-backed Frank Hogan, campaigning for election to the United States Senate. Hogan, district attorney in Manhattan, has won frequent recognition for his devotion to public service and his views on matters of public concern.

Also, in a key race, Anthony B. Akers is running on the Democratic ticket for Congress in the Seventeenth Congressional District, also known as New York City's "silk stocking district." He has the active support of organized labor in his fight to wrest control of this district from the Republican Party.

When Harriman was elected governor in 1954, he restored democratic rule to the state, doing so in his insistence that the wage and salary earners must be protected against exploitation.

He led a classic fight against the Republican-controlled legislature in an effort to improve workmen's compensation and unemployment insurance, calling the legislature back into special session after he had vetoed proposals that would have done harm to the workers and to many seasonal employers, such as those in the needle trades.

Looking out for the consumer, he brought about for the first time state regulation of interest rates and other charges and terms of installment sales.

Schools have been helped greatly under his administration, with aid to education having been increased 77.6 per cent in four years.

Hogan, as the candidate for U.S. Senator, has for the last 17 years directed the operations of the busiest law office in the world. He has been a fair and determined prosecutor, and has been active in many civic affairs, among these as chairman in 1952 of the Brotherhood Week observances for the New York Region of the National Council of Christians and Jews.

Akers stands for adequate public housing, equitable taxation, better schools, modernization of the restrictive immigration laws, and other legislation that would benefit the people.

Amalgamated Bank and Union To Sponsor TV Weather Show

The Amalgamated Bank and the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America announced this week that they will sponsor a twice-a-week five-minute weather program on WABC-TV, Channel 7, in the New York area. The Amalgamated sponsorship will begin on October 27.

It is estimated that the program will reach not only New York City, but heavily populated areas in four states as far as 60 miles from New York City.

The program will introduce a contest to stimulate interest in the Amalgamated union label and the Amalgamated Bank. Contest entry blanks may be obtained at any retail clothing, furnishings or department store, where the sales clerk will validate the entry by writing in the number of the contestant's union label in a suit, coat, shirt, or other item of apparel. The contestant must then write in 25 words or less a brief summary of the advantages of union label apparel.

Winners will be chosen by a panel of judges every month. First prize is a $250 open account in the Amalgamated Bank. Second and third best entry writers will receive $150 and $100 accounts in the Bank.

The program will be accompanied by strong promotional efforts, particularly among apparel retailers in the area covered by Channel 7. It is hoped that the program will stimulate interest not only in the Amalgamated Bank but also help promote union label consciousness among consumers.

NY Shirt Bd. Discusses Need to Register, Vote

The importance of registering in order to be eligible to vote in the November election was discussed at a meeting of shop chairladies called by the Joint Board of Shirt, Leisurewear, Robe, Glove and Rainwear Workers Union of New York, under the management of Charles Garrahan, on September 22.

Garrahan and Emil Starr, national education director of the Amalgamated, were the speakers. The tie-in of politics with economics was stressed by both of them.

In the shirtmakers' union the matter of registration has two points that had to be cleared up and this was done by the speakers. One was that the Puerto Rican members have to take the literacy test in order to qualify as voters and a fear prevails among them that it is a complicated procedure and they will not be able to take the test.

A preponderant majority of members of this joint board are women and those who are married think that because their husbands are voters they automatically are qualified to vote.

The shop chairladies were urged by Garrahan and Starr to talk to the people in the shops and explain both problems —that of the Puerto Ricans, and of the married women, which are based on misunderstandings. It should not be difficult for the chairladies to explain to those that have to take the literacy test that it is much simpler than they think and anyone who can read and write will find this test quite easy to pass.

As for the married women who have not voted in previous elections, the explanation must be made to them that regardless of the voting status of their husbands they, too, will have to take the literacy test and register in order to be able to vote.

A thorough explanation was given by the speakers about the relationship between political action and the economic condition of the workers. They cited instances of how the interests of the workers sustained a defeat because they elected representatives in Congress or in state legislatures who promulgated anti-labor laws and failed to vote in favor of laws that would improve wages and working conditions.

Political action by organized labor, the speakers stressed, would have prevented the adoption of the vicious, anti-labor Taft-Hartley Act and the strike-breaking "right-to-work" law that is now in force in 18 states.

Garrahan and Starr also discussed the question of the necessity to raise funds for the Amalgamated Political Education Committee. Since union funds cannot be used in a national election campaign it remains for the members to make voluntary contributions to APEC.

Freeman, McCarthy Head Strong Liberal Ticket

In Minnesota, labor is backing a strong slate of liberal candidates based, for the most part, upon their fine records in office. These candidates, running on the Democratic-Farmer-Labor ticket, have shown by their records that they deserve the support of labor and liberal groups in the state.

Heading the ticket is Governor Orville Freeman, who seeks re-election, and Congressman Eugene J. McCarthy, who is running for a seat in the U.S. Senate.

Along with these two men, the Amalgamated and other segments of organized labor in Minnesota are supporting the re-election of Congressman Roy Wier, of the Third Congressional District, and the election of Joseph E. Karth, who is campaigning for the Congressional seat in the Fourth Congressional District being vacated by McCarthy.

Governor Freeman, a veteran of public office, has vigorously demonstrated his concern for the welfare of the people of Minnesota. During his administrations, his program has been geared to improving the general welfare of the workers and the farmers as well as all the wage-earners.

McCarthy, in his campaign for the Senate seat, has the benefits of great experience in public office and a fine record of support for liberal legislation beneficial to labor. As a veteran Congressman, he consistently supported such important legislation as the minimum wage, hospital and school construction, reduced income taxes and farm price supports.

Congressman Wier has a liberal record in Congress equal to that of his colleague, McCarthy. A former labor organizer, Wier has served the cause of liberalism in the House of Representatives with integrity and fervor.

In seeking the Congressional seat in the Fourth District vacated by McCarthy, Karth stands for the same liberal platform and program of McCarthy. As a representative in the state legislature for the past eight years, Karth has introduced many important measures beneficial to the people.

Labor Supports Kennedy, Furcolo for Re-election

In the election campaign in Massachusetts, the working people of this industrial state are solidly behind the re-election of Senator John Kennedy and Governor Foster Furcolo. Both men are running on the Democratic ticket.

Labor is also supporting the candidacy of John L. Saltonstall for Congressman from the Tenth Congressional District. Senator Kennedy is well known to the voters of Massachusetts for his brilliant record as a liberal in the Senate. An ardent supporter of legislation beneficial to the working men and women of the country, he has also been an outspoken supporter of improved civil rights legislation.

On the labor and economic front, Kennedy has been one of the leaders in the fight for good labor laws that would protect the security and rights of the organized worker. He fashioned the Kennedy-Ives labor reform bill, which labor backed. He was also one of the stalwart backers of improved unemployment compensation benefits to help fight the present recession and for the increase in social security benefits, which was recently adopted.

Furcolo, a veteran legislator, served in the House of Representatives before he became governor. An opponent of anti-labor measures, including the infamous Taft-Hartley Law, he has given the people of Massachusetts good liberal government during his term in office. Recognizing labor's contribution to civic affairs, he recently appointed ACWA vice-president Joseph Salerno as a member of the State Board of Education.

In the Tenth Congressional District, labor is backing Saltonstall in his campaign to win the Congressional seat from the incumbent, Republican Laurence Curtis. Though related to the Republican Senator, Leverett Salonstall, the young man noted that he became a Democrat years ago when he realized "the Democratic Party was for all the people."

A strong supporter of civil rights for all, Saltonstall is chairman of the Massachusetts Council for Civil Rights. His background as a lawyer with many years of government experience will serve him in good stead as a liberal Congressman.

Labor Helps Williams In Race for the Senate

In New Jersey, labor's political arm is working on all cylinders to achieve victory for the labor-endorsed candidacy of Harrison A. Williams for U. S. Senator.

The labor campaign to elect Williams over the opposition of his big business Republican opponent, Robert W. Kean, has spread throughout the state, with great support coming from the rank and file. New Jersey trade unionists have made a careful study of the voting records of both Williams and Kean while they served together in Congress from 1954 to 1956.

The analysis proves conclusively that as a Congressman, Williams casts his votes for "the little guy" who has to work for a living. On issue after issue, Williams supported recommendations of the labor movement on legislative measures before Congress for consideration.

On the other hand, the analysis demonstrates that Kean rejected labor's recommendations and has faithfully supported the big business philosophy that has marked the present national Administration.

A genuine friend of labor, Williams has received the unanimous endorsement of labor in New Jersey.

On the issues facing the nation, Williams has taken a liberal, forthright stand. On the economic front, he is keenly aware of the problem of recession in the midst of inflation. "We have had very little good analysis of why this should happen," he said in a recent interview. "We should have a more intelligent study of the wage-price relationship, and specifically of how the consumer dollar is divided, and who gets it. Such a study might suggest programs necessary to meet inflation."

Other anti-recession moves called for by Williams include establishment of federal standards for unemployment compensation programs, and an increase in the minimum wage to an adequate hourly rate of at least $1.25.

In the field of civil rights, Williams has long been an outspoken advocate of the extension of civil rights to all citizens. He said that moral leadership is required for the complete accomplishment of desgregation, particularly in the schools.

An enthusiastic campaigner, Williams, with aid from the AFL-CIO, is bringing these issues to the voters throughout the state. He deserves the full support of the liberal and labor people of the state.

Ribicoff, Dodd, Bowles, Roberts Seek Election

In two leading New England states, liberal public officials with fine records in office are campaigning for election with labor's full support. In Connecticut, they are Governor Abraham Ribicoff, seeking re-election, former Congressman Thomas J. Dodd, who is running for the U.S. Senate seat now held by Senator William A. Purtell, and former Governor Chester Bowles, who seeks the Congressional seat from the Second Congressional District. In Rhode Island, labor backs Governor Dennis J. Roberts for re-election. All candidates are Democrats.

Governor Ribicoff has established a fine record in behalf of the general welfare during his tenure in office. A man of high principles, he has supported decent labor and social legislation for the people of his state and has been a ceaseless fighter to improve the economic conditions of the working men and women.

Dodd, a former member of the House of Representatives, made a fine record as a liberal Congressman. He supported measures giving aid to education, extending unemployment compensation, lowering income taxes for the low-income group, and encouraging public housing. He has long been an opponent of the Republicans' giveaway program of the nation's natural resources. A popular figure in Connecticut, Dodd has the wholehearted suport of the liberals.

Chester Bowles, candidate for Congress, is a national public figure. A former governor, he has distinguished himself in public office as a fighter for the people. As ambassador to India in the Truman Administration, he spoke and acted ardently for the underdeveloped nations and for greater understanding among the democratic nations of the world.

In seeking a seat in Congress, Bowles stands ready to serve his state and his country in public office, bringing years of experience to the job. A true liberal, he can be counted upon to uphold the best interests of the men and women who do the work of this nation.

Nixon Again Tricky On Tax Cut Plan

WASHINGTON—Vice-President Richard Nixon's tax proposals, based as they are on the "trickle-down" theory, would "both repeat and intensify" past mistakes, the AFL-CIO "Economic Trends & Outlook" says in an analysis of his program in its September edition.

The Vice-President unveiled his plan at the fiftieth anniversary conference of the Harvard School of Business Administration. It would ease taxes for business and the wealthy, and clamp a 1.5 per cent federal sales tax in the form of a manufacturers' excise levy on consumers.

"Economic Trends," which is published by the AFL-CIO committee on economic policy, recalled Nixon's claim in his address that "we cannot raise the floor of security unless we raise the ceiling of opportunity."

Lawrence, Leader, Maietta Win Labor's Full Support

With David L. Lawrence and George M. Leader heading the ticket, Pennsylvania's voters have been given an outstanding list of candidates by the Democratic Party.

Lawrence for governor and Leader for U.S. Senator is the slogan among Amalgamated affiliates and other trade unions in the Keystone State.

In some of the key Congressional races, the Amalgamated has given its full support to:

Julia Maietta, an Amalgamated national representative, in the Twentieth Congressional District.

Daniel J. Flood for re-election in the Eleventh Congressional District.

Charles E. Lotz, of Pottsville, for election in the Twelfth Congressional District.

John H. Bream, of suburban Harrisburg, for election in the Sixteenth Congressional District.

Van Zandt, Fenton Records Weak

In the Twentieth Congressional District, the Republican incumbent, James E. Van Zandt, has a ragged record. In the last Congress, he voted to cut $2 million in grants for the aged, blind, disabled, and dependent children. He also voted on two issues for the high-cost private power corporations as they fought atomic energy controls and TVA low-cost power.

Sister Maietta, who came out of the shops as a worker to work for the people in the shops, has served on many public boards, including the War Manpower Commission and the Clearfield County Public Assistance Board.

She is basing her campaign on tax cuts for the low income groups, raising unemployment and social security benefits, inaugurating a broad program of road, school, and hospital construction, and easing credit controls.

Lotz' opponent, Ivor D. Fenton, the Republican incumbent voted in the last Congress to cut funds for the blind and aged, etc., and to cut extension of unemployment compensation benefits by three weeks, a fact that has already hurt thousands of jobless Pennsylvanians. He also voted against a good housing bill and for states to hamstring the working man in his efforts to bargain with his employer.

Bream is opposing Walter Mumma, who compiled an anti-public record in Congress. Mumma voted to reduce the extension of unemployment compensation benefits, and against housing, adequate help for the aged and blind, and against the working people through his vote on a labor bill. Mumma is considered one of the reactionaries in the House.

Flood has compiled one of the finest records in the House of Representatives, voting for monies for the aged, blind, etc., decent public housing, more schools, and for a proposal that would have helped depressed areas get back on their feet.

The two men heading the ticket — Lawrence and Leader — have done outstanding jobs. Lawrence as mayor of Pittsburgh, has been a spearhead in revitalizing that city by putting in smoke control, rebuilding the business district, bringing in new industries, and providing motorists with ample parking space in the business district, among other constructive accomplishments.

Leader, whose excellent leadership as governor is well known in Pennsylvania, will carry on his liberal views in the U.S. Senate, where he would support laws that would help expand industry in that state, provide for more schools and public housing, and many other key items that would make the lot of the working people and their families much richer.

RR Doom Prophecy Hit by Rail Union

WASHINGTON — A spokesman for railway labor charged that management has been unduly pessimistic about the future of rail transport. He backed up his statement with industry's own statistics.

D'Alesandro, Tawes Head Labor-Supported Slate

The team of D'Alesandro and Tawes is heading up a strong labor-backed ticket in Maryland that includes such outstanding candidates for Congress as Johnston, Brewster, Garmatz, Fallon, Lankford, Foley, and Friedel.

Thomas D'Alesandro, Jr., running for the U.S. Senate, has a powerful background of good government. He was a member of Congress from 1938 to 1947 and built up and enviable record.

As mayor of Baltimore since 1947, D'Alesandro has carried out the greatest program of public improvements in the city's history. As the next U.S. Senator from Maryland, he would be in the forefront of the fight to bring good government — government of the people and for the people—back to Washington.

J. Millard Tawes, the Democratic gubernatorial candidate, has served as state comptroller 16 years, has been state banking commissioner, chairman of the board of revenue estimates, and a member of the board of public works. With this solid background, he would be a fine administrator.

Edward A. Garmatz, George H. Fallon, Richard E. Lankford, and Samuel N. Friedel are seeking re-election from the Third, Fourth, Fifth and Seventh Congressional Districts, respectively. Their records in Congress have been consistently in favor of legislation that would help the working people, whether it be for more schools to meet the education crisis, or unemployment compensation, social security of taxes.

Also on the Democratic ticket are these capable men seeking to unseat their Republican incumbents: Thomas F. Johnson, with a long and good record in the state senate, running for Congress from the First Congressional District; Daniel F. Brewster, a two-term member of the house of delegates, is labor-supported Congressional candidate in the Second District; John R. Foley, with a record of strong support for good government, running for Congress from the Sixth District.

This is a strong and good slate. It deserves the solid support of all the voters.

Hartke Wins Labor Backing

Vance Hartke, organized labor's and the Democratic Party's outstanding candidate for U. S. Senator from Indiana, summed up his philosophy of proper representation for the people this way:

"What is good for labor is good for the country."

He believes in stronger and more adequate unemployment compensation, is opposed to laws that would harr· labor, and will work for ways to halt the recession and bring prosperity back to the country and its workers.

A World War II Navy veteran, Hartke in 1955, became the youngest mayor in the history of Evansville. Since then, he has made a remarkable record as chief executive of the industrial and commercial metropolis of southwestern Indiana.

Hartke has taken a keen interest and participation in the affairs of his city and state. Prior to his being mayor, he served as deputy prosecutor of Vanderburgh County, and also was a member of the Federal Rivers and Harbors Advisory Committee.

He was an outstanding student while at Evansville College. His marks were so excellent that he received the first double scholarship ever given by the University of Indiana Law School, where he was also editor of the "Indiana Law Journal."

Strong Democratic Slate Opposes "Work" Measure

A strong slate of Democratic candidates in California has the strong endorsement of organized labor. These candidates are pledged to support liberal policies and will greatly strengthen the liberal forces in the Congress and in the state government.

Heading the Democratic ticket in the November elections are Congressman Clair Engle, running for U.S. Senator against Republican Governor Goodwin Knight, and attorney general Edmund G. "Pat" Brown, campaigning against Republican Senator William Knowland for the governorship of California.

Besides Engle and Brown, labor is supporting Superior Court Judge Stanley Mosk for attorney general.

A major issue in the California elections is Proposition 18, a measure that would give California a "right-to-work" law. (See details of "right-to-work" legislation on Pages 8 and 9 of this issue.)

All of the Democratic candidates have come out strongly against this "right-to-work" proposition on the grounds that it is against the rights of organized labor.

On the other hand, though Senator Knowland is building a major part of his campaign in support of the "right-to-work" issue, his party has refrained from taking a stand on Proposition 18.

Senator Knowland, the Senate minority leader, has a long record of reaction to his credit which is not helping his campaign for the governorship. On the other hand, Democrat Brown has endorsed the liberal view of issues in the campaign and strongly opposes the "right-to-work" law that Knowland backs.

Knowland Fights Labor

Labor has long opposed the conservative, big business policies of the Administration and it is these same policies which Knowland not only represents, but formulates. If anything, Knowland is more reactionary than the Administration.

In the gubernatorial race, Engle has waged a strong, progressive campaign to defeat Governor Knight. Engle, who has served long and well in the House of Representatives, is outspoken against measures that would restrict labor's rights. As a Congressman he has compiled a solid liberal record on key issues involving water and public power, labor, civil rights, foreign affairs, inflation, small business, social security and education.

The working people of Missouri have top-flight candidates to represent them unselfishly in Congress.

Stuart J. Symington is seeking re-election on the Democratic ticket for the United States Senate. He has labor's whole-hearted support in view of the excellent record he has compiled in Washington.

James L. Sullivan has organized labor's full support in his bid for Congressman from the Second Congressional District in St. Louis. He is opposing the incumbent, Thomas B. Curtis, whose voting record on key issues vitally affecting his constituents was far below par.

Also in St. Louis, the Amalgamated and other segments of labor are supporting:

Frank M. Karsten in the First Congressional District and Lenor K. Sullivan in the Third Congressional District Both are seeking re-election and, on the basis of their outstanding records in the House of Representatives, labor has given them solid endorsement.

James Sullivan, seeking to unseat his Republican opponent, is campaigning on a four-square platform that includes support of the $1.25 minimum wage, expanded public housing to take the people out of the slums, repeal of Section 14 (b) of the Taft-Hartley Law that gives states the right to pass vicious "right-to-work" laws, and a foreign policy that removes bluffs and slogans so evident in the Republican foreign policy.

Proxmire, Nelson, Reuss And Zablocki Head Ticket

William Proxmire, who scored a stunning victory on the Democratic ticket last year to fill the unexpired Senate term of the late Joseph McCarthy, is running this year with labor's support for a full six-year term as U.S. Senator from Wisconsin.

He has as running mates a group of outstanding Wisconsonites also with organized labor's support: Gaylord Nelson for governor, along with Congressmen John Zablocki and Henry S. Reuss, seeking re-election in the Fourth and Fifth Congressional Districts, respectively.

Nelson, a leading member of the Wisconsin State Senate, is conducting a hard-hitting gubernatorial campaign against the Republican state administration's failure to keep its promise of running a debt-free government.

Nelson was one of the leaders fighting against the notorious anti-labor Catlin Act, and has promised that "under no circumstances would I tolerate a 'right-to-work' bill — a phony proposal from beginning to end."

In his short time in the United States Senate, Proxmire has won the respect of his colleagues. His voting record was strong for the people and included favoring improved public housing, unemployment compensation, social security, public assistance, and labor relations.

Reuss and Zablocki both made enviable records in the field of public housing, social security, unemployment compensation benefits, and other items that would have been of great help in alleviating the recession.

Labor Backs Holmes For Governor

With an outstanding record compiled in two short years as governor, Robert Holmes is seeking election for a full term on November 4.

He has labor's full support as do these candidates for Congress:

Robert Thornton, seeking to unseat the arch reactionary, Walter Norblad, in the First District; and Al Ullman and Charles Porter, running for re-election in the Second and Fourth Districts, respectively.

Thornton had a top-flight record from a labor and liberal point of view in the Oregon legislature. In 1952, when he won the attorney generalship, he became the first Democrat in many, many years to hold that post. He was re-elected in 1956.

His opponent, Norblad, had a voting record that went for the private utilities as against the public interests, more and needed schools, and also against labor.

Ullman and Porter voted for the people's interests in Congress, and they are campaigning on their records in favor of such issues as public power development to help the great Northwest, for schools, housing, and other legislation to help the people.

Holmes, the Democratic gubernatorial candidate, was elected in 1956 to fill an unexpired term, and since has established a state commission on resource conservation and development, established a program of industrial development for the state, and has co-operated with other governors in the Northwest in the battle for public power development so essential to the Northwest's growth.

2 Lumber and Paper Unions Near Merger

PORTLAND, Ore. — The possible merger of two AFL-CIO unions in the lumber and paper industry moved a step ahead when the executive board of the Woodworkers at a meeting here ratified a two-year interim agreement with the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers aimed at ultimate unification.

The Pulp-Sulphite executive board had acted previously. Both boards approved the 10-point pact without dissent.

DiSalle and Young Hold Key to Ohio Prosperity

Two hard-hitting liberals—Michael DiSalle for governor and Stephen Young for U. S. Senator—head the Democratic ticket that has won organized labor's support in Ohio.

Both are staunch opponents of the vicious "right-to-work" proposal, and will continue their fight, if elected, on a state and national level against legislation that would hurt working people.

Two able Democrats—Ted Osborne in the First Congressional District and James O. Bradley in the Second Congressional District—are putting on a bang up campaign to defeat their reactionary Republican incumbents, Gordon H. Scherer, in the First, and William E. Hess, in the Second.

Scherer and Hess have compiled plain, downwright anti-people records. They've been against housing, schools, the aged and blind, labor, and the health of the public by voting to cut appropriations to the Food and Drug Administration.

Osborne and Bradley, on the other hand, stand fully behind all efforts to bring protection and help to the people through good legislation. They oppose laws that would hurt the wage and salary earners in their efforts to organize and bargain for a contract. They will help bring prosperity back to Ohio.

DiSalle has mapped a long-range program of "insurance against future recession" which would attract new industry to the state, aid communities for industrial expansion, increase aid to the aged on the basis of need, guarantee equal rights in employment, and supplemental unemployment benefits. SUB has been a key issue in Ohio, with the Republican Party fighting these benefits negotiated by trade unions in an effort to give their out-of-work members additional income.

Young, in his bid for the U. S. Senate, has come out strongly for improving labor laws to protect unions and their members from raiding and anti-labor bosses. He supports public housing, slum clearance, and other means of bringing comfort and health to the people.

In his campaign, he has pointed out how the Republican Party has failed to act to stop the recession, and, in fact, has opposed sound legislation in the fields of tax cuts for the low and middle income families, public housing, school construction, bringing unemployment compensation benefits up-to-date—legislation that would have helped bring back prosperity.

Williams, Hart Stand For Liberal Government

All segments of organized labor in the industrial state of Michigan are staunchly supporting Governor G. Mennen Williams' campaign for re-election and lieutenant governor Philip A. Hart's race for the U.S. Senate.

Both these men have served the cause of liberalism in public office and have earned labor's endorsement on the basis of their records. Under Williams' leadership as governor for five terms, Michigan has enjoyed one of the greatest periods of progress in all its history.

Time after time, Williams has marshaled the forces in his party to push and drag a reluctant Republican Party along the path of social progress in the state legislature.

He stands solidly on the issues of good labor legislation and civil rights, and his record shows he stands for a furtherance of a fair deal for the working people and their families in Michigan.

In his fight for a seat in the U.S. Senate, Hart brings years of public service to the task. As the first full-time lieutenant governor in Michigan, he served brilliantly under Williams. Like Williams, he represents liberal thought in government.

Also supported by labor is John S. Swainson, Democratic candidate for lieutenant governor.

Labor Urges Re-election Of Senator Paul Douglas

In his campaign for re-election, Senator Paul Douglas has the enthusiastic backing of all segments of labor in the industrial State of Illinois. One of the great liberals in the Senate, Douglas has led the fight for liberal government in the Congress and the Administration.

Running on the Democratic ticket with Douglas are Congressmen Sidney R. Yates, of the Ninth Congressional District, and Charles A. Boyle, of the Twelfth Congressional District. These able, progressive Congressmen are also strongly endorsed by labor in their race for re-election. Both men have voted solidly for labor and social legislation beneficial to the working men and women of the nation.

As part of their political action program, the Chicago Joint Board sponsored a meeting at which Senator Douglas and Congressman Yates addressed the Amalgamated membership.

In presenting Senator Douglas, Sam Smith, manager of the Chicago Joint Board, said that the voters must elect enlightened, progressive leaders like Douglas if the country is going to solve the serious problem of recession and peace.

Douglas noted the political structure of the Congress and pointed out that the Democrats, excluding the "Dixiecrats," form the liberal bloc that is working for the welfare of labor and the country as a whole.

He attacked anti-labor forces in the country who are seeking to undermine labor's legitimate rights through oppressive legislation.

Congressman Yates, in his address, paid tribute to Senator Douglas for his forthright leadership in the cause of liberalism.

Voters in 6 States Urged to Defeat "Work" Laws That Threaten Unionism

"Right-to-work" laws have one major aim — to keep down the level of wages and salaries by weakening unions and undermining collective bargaining.

That conclusion was drawn in "Union Security — The Case Against 'Right-to-Work' Laws," definitive study of what these laws have done to the living standards of wage and salary earners.

It is particularly timely because voters in six states will vote on such laws on November 4. The states are California, Colorado, Idaho, Kansas, Ohio, and Washington. (See box showing various numerical designations in next column.)

The Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, along with the rest of organized labor, has long been cognizant of the dangers inherent in "right-to-work" laws.

Scores of clergymen and church organizations representing the three major faiths have gone on record as opposed to "right-to-work" laws. (See excerpts from remarks of three leading clergymen below.)

Many clear-thinking industrialists are opposed to interfering with trade union duties. Among them is J. Paul Getty, head of the giant Tidewater Oil Co., and the richest man in America and possibly in the world, who says he's a "union man," and blames management's charge of "excessive" labor costs as a "handy excuse to cover up inept management's inability to meet competition."

These "right-to-work" laws are drawn up by the most vicious of the anti-labor elements, and peddled under all sorts of disguises in hopes of entrapping voters into believing that the laws will help them get jobs.

That is far from the case. These laws do not guarantee jobs. They do assure the anti-labor employers of keeping wages down. (See box on Page 9 showing wages in "right-to-work" states as against those in neighboring states that do not have any laws hamstringing workers from organizing and bargaining collectively with their employers.)

These laws have still another design — weaken, and even destroy, labor unions to such an extent that they would not be able to represent their members adequately and properly.

The sponsors of these laws also claim that they will help their states economically.

"These laws cannot create markets where they do not exist or where consumer purchasing power is low," is the answer supplied in the book, "Union Security," which was published only a few days ago by the AFL-CIO following exhaustive studies made by the headquarters departments. (The book can be obtained by writing to the AFL-CIO Department of Publications, 815 Sixteenth Street, N.W., Washington 6, D.C. The price is $1.50.)

In line with the Amalgamated's long-standing policy, the union's locals and joint boards in the states in which its members are facing the "right-to-work" issue on November 4 have been working diligently to explain to the membership, their families, and to other voters why these laws are dangerous.

In Ohio, for instance, the Cincinnati and Cleveland Joint Boards and ACWA locals elsewhere in the state joined organized labor in Ohio at a giant rally in Columbus on Sunday, October 7. (See story on Page 9.)

As part of its general election campaign, the Los Angeles Joint Board has held meetings and gone to the electorate to fight the proposal there. (See story on Page 9.)

Locals in Kanasas, Colorado, and Washington, where the ACWA also has members in states voting on the issue on November 4, have been active in their localities to alert the electorate to the real facts about the "work" law proposals.

How States List "Work" Proposals

This is the way the "right-to-work" proposal is listed in six states:

California, Proposition No. 18.
Colorado, No. 5.
Kansas, No. 3.
Ohio, Issue No. 2.
Washington, Initiative No. 202.

Vote "No" and preserve freedom of collective bargaining.

In Idaho, there is a gimmick with two proposals on the ballot — No. 100 in favor; No. 101 against "right-to-work." Voters should vote for No. 101.

Religious Leaders Attack "Work" Laws

The Protestant View

Rev. Dr. Walter G. Muelder, dean and professor of social ethics, Boston University School of Theology, is one of the nation's foremost teachers of Christian Theology and Christian ethics

"All moral rights root in the worth of persons in the community. This means that rights are claimed by persons in their relations with other persons. No one right or claim is unconditional but must prove itself in the light of all other claims. In the last analysis, the standard of measuring the rights of man is the kind of person we ought to develop in society. The kinds of persons we need and can approve of in a democratic society are not the kinds that look out only for themselves but who are responsible members of the community.

"In modern industrial society, personal and group relationships are highly complex. Industrial peace and labor management relations cannot be taken for granted. They must be positively striven for. They can be easily undermined where either party violates the assumptions on which industrial peace exists. We must keep these factors in mind when we reflect on the efforts in numerous states to undermine through 'right-to-work' legislation the basic security of organized labor.

"It is a most irresponsible social policy to destroy the integrity of labor unions under the guise of the so-called 'right-to-work.' The individual worker has no effective legal right to work under conditions worthy of human dignity where strong unions have been eliminated. Since collective bargaining is under present circumstances a proved condition of stable industrial relations, a worker has a moral obligation to accept his share of responsibility through membership in organized labor.

"'Right-to-work' laws do not create jobs; they only victimize the worker and make his organization ineffective."

The Catholic View

Rev. William J. Kelley, O.M.I., LL.D., is a lecturer at Catholic University, Washington, D.C. and one of the nation's authorities on labor legislation

"No man can put God out of his world. Man is a social being created by God. Man is not an economic unit. His final end is God and not economic production.

"There is resident within man a natural instinct for association. This instinct man has from his very nature from the day he was created by God. Right reason and Sacred Scripture both support man's right to association. Since man has this natural right, society has the obligation to honor this specific right.

"The American working men and women have, over the years, sought to protect their primary right of association by seeking security clauses in their collective bargaining contract. They are a necessary means to the security sought in the act of association. To deny the use of a necessary means to obtain a just end, namely the right of association, is contrary to sound social morality.

"I hold that these 'right-to-work' laws take away from man a necessary means to achieve and protect his God-given right of association. . . . such legislation makes a mockery of the constitutional right to organize for the common good and welfare.

"It seems to me that this 'right-to-work' legislation defies the majority rule of our democracy and even goes to the extent of placing an individual right before the group rights of fellow-workers.

"The 'right-to-work' laws may well be an invitation to disaster of the general welfare.

"'Right-to-work' laws are immoral according to Catholic social teaching."

The Jewish View

Dr. Israel Goldstein, Rabbi of the Congregation B'nai Jeshurun in New York, President of the American Jewish Congress, has served as a member of the National Labor Relations Board

"Just as work is glorified in the Jewish tradition, so a concern for laboring people is also a recurrent theme in Jewish moral law. In keeping with this age-old concern for laboring people, Jewish religious groups have always vigorously supported the rights of laboring men and women to organize and to work in conditions of dignity and decency.

"By organization and collective bargaining, the individual worker has been able to convert the 'strength of all to the strength of each.' Perhaps most important of all, the trade union has been one of the most effective forces in resisting the de-humanization of the worker which has resulted from the industrialization of our society.

"The so-called 'right-to-work' laws, no matter what their title, seek the destruction of the trade union movement, the abrogation of democratic rights which it has taken decades to secure and the undermining of one of the strongest pillars of American democracy.

"They do not guarantee work for, or increase the opportunities of Negroes, Jews, or other members of minority groups, nor do they guarantee women employment. . . .

"Union security agreements are merely devices whereby an attempt is made to distribute the cost of unionism among all the persons who receive its benefits . . . a perfectly sensible, fair and essentially moral arrangement.

"'Right-to-work' laws . . . amount to the government telling the parties most concerned that they may not agree to a particular type of arrangement believed by both parties to be both sound and fair. I condemn 'right-to-work' laws."

ACWA Urges Political Activity

ment has brought a new element of political democracy to our nation. At one time, elections were decided by corporate wealth and political machines. Today, through unions, the voice of the worker plays an increasingly important part in the electoral process. Political activity by working people is not only a right, it is an obligation — it has helped to make our government more broadly representative of the people and more responsive to the general welfare.

Resolved, that the twenty-first biennial convention of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, AFL-CIO:

1—Strongly urges every local union and joint board to exert itself to the utmost in this vital election year, particularly in such areas as raising voluntary contributions, educating union members on the issues, and co-operating with other organizations in campaigns in support of liberal and enlightened candidates and programs.

2—Calls upon local unions and joint boards to set up special committees to assure that every Amalgamated member is registered to vote in the 1958 elections, which will check the names of members in each shop against registration records and give all assistance possible to those who are not yet registered.

CLEVELAND DELEGATION: This group of Amalgamated members represented the Cleveland Joint Board at labor's rally in Columbus to stop the "right-to-work" proposal on the November 4 ballot. They are shown in front of the bus that carried them to the rally.

Vote No! Is the Ohio Slogan On "Work" Law Issue No. 2

Bucking a multi-million dollar campaign by anti-labor forces, Ohio trade unions are rallying their members, families, and friends to defeat Issue No. 2 ("right-to-work") on November 4.

One of the highlights in labor's campaign was a major rally attended by some 4,000 trade unionists in Columbus on Sunday, September 7.

Amalgamated groups were among the leading delegations that came by chartered buses and motorcades from every corner of Ohio.

The Cincinnati Joint Board and its locals, the Cleveland Joint Board and its locals, and Local 435 in Versailles and Local 449 in Coldwater, sent large representations, with ACWA vice-president Jack Kroll, manager of the Cincinnati Joint Board, and Max Amdur, manager of the Cleveland Joint Board, leading the groups.

The rally was sponsored by United Organized Labor of Ohio and was planned by the steering committee, of which Kroll is a member.

Some 60 Cincinnati Joint Board members and their wives went by bus and auto to Columbus. The delegation included, in addition to Kroll, Marco Meccia, assistant manager; Henry Seibert, Jr., president; Joseph Eisen, recording secretary; Henry Schroeder, secretary-treasurer; Henry Seibert, Walter T. Grainger, and Joseph Sepate, business representatives; and Emma Ferrari, education director.

The Amalgamated and other trade union groups served notice on the Ohio Chamber of Commerce that they will fight the "right-to-work" proposal right down to the wire — and the wire is election day, November 4.

With "Vote No on Issue No. 2" as a principal slogan, the people at the Columbus rally went back home to do a real job pointing up how a "right-to-work" law is really a right-to-scab proposition that guarantees nobody a job, and would weaken, and eventually destroy, organized labor.

In fact, a "right-to-work" supporter, professor Russell Decker, of Bowling Green University, admitted that during a debate in Findlay, Ohio, on July 17. Asked if such a law would weaken trade unions during negotiations, he replied:

"Yes, it would weaken unions at the collective bargaining table. That is one of the purposes of the 'right-to-work' proposal."

That is why the industrialists and other anti-labor factions in Ohio have spent millions of dollars to jam this proposal into law on November 4.

The day before the Columbus rally, trade unions in Cincinnati held a major education conference. Among the sponsors was the Cincinnati Joint Board, while Emma Ferrari, the joint board's education director, served on the conference committee as recording secretary.

One of the key subjects discussed was "What can labor learn about communication and community relations from the present 'right-to-work' issue?" The moderator was Dr. Gerald Harriman, chairman of the department of business administration, Xavier University.

LA Board Builds Campaign Against Proposition No. 18

LOS ANGELES—More than 250 member-delegates of the Los Angeles Joint Board, employed in plants from as far north as Visalia and as far south as San Diego, attended a full-day "Meet the Candidates" political conference on Saturday, September 27.

In a full and exciting program, delegates heard the outspoken opposition of their endorsed candidates to Proposition 18, the "right-to-work" proposition which will appear on the November 4 ballot and around which one of the most vigorous and serious campaigns in recent political history is being fought in California.

In his opening remarks, Morris Zusman, president of the Los Angeles Joint Board, indicated that it was the purpose of the conference to give the ACWA members a greater insight into the national and state issues of the campaign so that they would understand their urgency most fully and elect ACWA-endorsed candidates.

After a conference briefing by joint board education director Ruth Miller, the group was divided into four sections and from 10 a.m. until noon discussed two questions, "Right-to-Work and Other Proposed Legislation to Control Labor" and "Economic Issues of the 1958 Campaign."

At the end of the first hour, discussion leaders changed places so that each group had the opportunity to discuss both questions.

Leaders were Edward Shedlock, regional director of the Utility Workers; Richard Cartwright, education director of the United Automobile Workers; Philip Schlessinger, political scientist and candidate for the California Assembly in the Fifty-sixth Assembly District; and Richard Baisden, assistant director of UCLA Extension.

In the discussion groups, members were given an opportunity to voice their opinions and ask questions on the issues of the day.

Each member was also supplied with materials on the economic issues, specially prepared for the day, materials on Proposition No. 18 with explanations of the importance of a "No" vote, campaign literature supplied by the ACWA-endorsed candidates, car stickers, bumper strips, and the like.

Luncheon was served at noon. Delegates were seated by Congressional District and, over hot dogs and coffee, discussed with their endorsed candidates, the best methods of working in the districts and precincts to insure the election of the candidates. Each delegate also signed a pledge card indicating the type of work he or she was most interested in doing.

Following lunch, joint board manager Jerome Posner called the afternoon session to order and asked the various candidates to address the group. They were:

Congressman Clair Engle, candidate for the U.S. Senate; superior court judge Stanley Mosk, candidate for state attorney-general and a long-time and devoted friend of the Amalgamated; Congressman Chet Holifield; Congressman James Roosevelt; Glenn Anderson, candidate for lieutenant governor; state senator Richard Richards.

Also, Emery Petty, candidate for Congress in the Fifteenth District; Irving Glasband, candidate for Congress in the Twenty-second; Mel Leonard, candidate for Congress in the Sixteenth; Edward R. Roybal, candidate for county supervisor; Richard Nevins, for the state board of equalization; and Judge Evelle Younger, candidate for the superior court.

Emphasis was placed by the candidates on the importance of defeating Proposition No. 18, the "right-to-work" proposal. Over and over again they pointed out that the passage of such a law would not only tear down labor's standards in this state but that the outcome was being viewed by the rest of the nation.

William J. McSorley Jr., assistant director of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, told the group that despite present adverse publicity, the American labor movement can point with justifiable pride to its progressive and consructive record.

He complimented the delegates on their activity and also the staff COPE co-ordinating committee, consisting of chairman Morris Zusman, secretary Ruth Miller, co-ordinator Harry Bloch, Griselda Kuhlman, Frank Panick, Leonard Levy, and Adel Rescili for their careful planning of the program. They were assisted by Mario Rosini, Arthur Lamla, Morris Arrons, Anthony de Chiazza, Martin Sanchez, and Lillie Mae Thomas.

The social committee, under the chairmanship of Abe Wise, efficiently handled the luncheon.

$ Facts About "Work" Laws

In all but one of the 18 states (Nevada) which already have "right-to-work" laws on their books, wages are lower than those states that have free unionism.

Here is a comparison of average hourly factory pay rates in 12 "right-to-work" states with next door non-"right-to-work" states. The figures are taken from the U.S. Department of Labor report of 1957.

States with no union shops		States with free unions
Virginia	$1.61	West Virginia	$2.10
Tennessee	1.65	Kentucky	1.98
Mississippi	1.40	Louisiana	1.94
Arkansas	1.46	Missouri	1.98
Texas	2.04	New Mexico	2.19
Iowa	2.05	Illinois	2.19
Nebraska	1.87	Kansas	2.08
South Dakota	1.79	Minnesota	2.08
North Dakota	1.82	Montana	2.21
Utah	2.25	Wyoming	2.40
Nevada	2.53	Idaho	2.10
Arizona	2.25	California	2.33

Five states with "right-to-work" laws were omitted because they did not border on states with free unionism. The sixth, Indiana, just passed its law in 1957 and the comparison had not been made. The five other states with "right-to-work" laws are Alabama, Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, and South Carolina.

Pittsburgh Board Marks 20th Year: Hears Potofsky

PITTSBURGH — Six hundred active union members came from four states to celebrate the twentieth anniversary of the Pittsburgh District Joint Board at a gala dinner in the Penn-Sheraton Hotel here and converted it into an inspiring political rally for enlightened candidates in the Congressional and Gubernatorial races which will be settled at the polls in November. The gathering heard stirring recitals of the early campaign to organize the shirtworkers in Pennsylvania and the neighboring states, and heard praise from others for the great contributions the Amalgamated has made to the lives of its members, the community and the nation, in the intervening years.

Men and women came from Ohio, Maryland, West Virginia and Western Pennsylvania to celebrate the event. They represented the 6,000 members who constitute the 39 local unions affiliated with the Pittsburgh District Joint Board.

Lawrence Praises ACWA

A spirited address was delivered by ACWA president Jacob S. Potofsky, who had just flown in from Europe and Israel to participate in the festivities. He roused his audience with a discussion of domestic and foreign issues, declaring that the two great domestic struggles are in the areas of employment and civil rights, and, in the international field, the struggle for peace in the face of world tensions.

Mayor David L. Lawrence, of Pittsburgh, Democratic candidate for Governor, extolled the Amalgamated as a pioneer in the fields of social welfare, housing and a host of other communal activities. He praised the integrity of its officers and the loyalty of the membership.

John Sobczak, joint board manager who served as toastmaster, reviewed the early struggles of the shirtworkers in Clearfield, Morgantown, and a score of other communities, which joined the revolt against sweatshop conditions in the early Thirties, inspired by Potofsky and other leaders. He contrasted the then existing sweatshop conditions with the great achievements of the present, the decent wage and working conditions under the Amalgamated banner, the paid vacations, the paid holidays, the comprehensive system of health and welfare benefits, including pensions.

The Amalgamated's Julia Maietta, Democratic candidate for Congress in the 20th District, received a warm greeting when she spoke briefly on the issues of the present election campaign and expressed confidence in her success at the polls next month.

Telegrams of greetings were received from Governor George M. Leader, Democratic candidate for U.S. Senate, who was campaigning in another part of the state, and from David J. McDonald, president of the United Steel Workers of America.

In his address, Potofsky expressed his warm feelings of comradeship with the joint board organization and noted that the "size of this gathering testifies to your growth, to your strength, and to the forceful role you play in your respective communities."

In stressing the need for labor to turn out at the polls in November to support liberal candidates, Potofsky briefly endorsed mayor Lawrence's campaign for the governorship and Governor Leader's race for the U.S. Senate, concluding on the note that "if I were a resident of Pennsylvania, I could think of no civic duty more pleasant than to cast my vote for George Leader and David Lawrence on Election Day."

He also warmly supported Sister Maietta's quest for Congress noting that the ACWA would sorely miss her services "but she will make a fine member of Congress."

Discusses Recession

Reviewing the problems of the present recession, Potofsky decried attempts of reactionaries "to talk away" the recession. "The Administration," he said, "is deluding itself if it thinks it can get rid of a major recession by waving it away or pointing a warning finger at inflation. Inflation is not our problem today — under-employment is our problem, and until the Administration girds itself for a full scale attack on unemployment, the economy will continue to limp along, one industry after another suffering from recession and worse."

He called for assurances of enough purchasing power and enough jobs to put our economy back on a sound basis. These steps must be backed up by action, he said. A healthy economy requires greater unemployment compensation benefits, improvements in social security, wider minimum wage coverage scaled to our standard of living, aid to education, and more housing, Potofsky told his audience.

He also dwelt on the grave problem of civil rights in the nation with particular emphasis on the "great crisis which is being acted out in Little Rock, Ark., and Front Royal, Va., and a half dozen communities, and which has a greater significance throughout the nation and throughout the world."

Calling discrimination one of the greatest liabilities in the United States, Potofsky theorized on what Presidents Truman and Roosevelt would have done "armed with such a decision (the Supreme Court decision on school integration) during their terms in office. They would have provided forceful leadership in the Administration and in Congress to implement the decision, and they would have given the nation a moral leadership which would have been felt in every home in the land."

Calls for Leadership

"It is a great tragedy, Potofsky said, "that our present leadership in Washington failed to take advantage of the opportunity."

He accused the Administration of evading the issue and failing to provide strong moral and governmental leadership.

Potofsky stressed the need for enlightened leadership in the government to cope with the problem of maintaining the peace of the world. "We need leadership to bring us not to the brink of war, but to negotiation and exploration of avenues of peace," he said.

He called on labor to contribute to the solution of these problems by participating whole-heartedly in the coming November elections. "We must show the same strength at the ballot box that we do at the bargaining table," he said.

"We must exert every ounce of energy on behalf of liberal and honest candidates for public office," Potofsky said. "Men and women who understand our needs, who know the story of past struggles and who sympathize with our future goals."

In his address, Sobczak detailed the growth of the Pittsburgh organization and went on to accuse the present Administration of representing the anti-labor elements of big business such as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers.

Noting that these anti-labor forces launched an attack on trade unions in the Congress and the states, Sobczak said:

"As a result of this vicious campaign, restrictive and anti-labor legislations was passed by Congress and in many state legislatures. The 'right-to-work' law is one of the most vicious. The workers in the great states of Ohio and California must turn out in great numbers to defeat this measure in November. You cannot separate politics from economics. The two must go together if we are to succeed."

At the conclusion of his address, Sobczak urged the members to take an active part in the elections and support the candidacies of Governor Leader and mayor Lawrence "because they express the deepest aspirations of the plain people of America."

Others who spoke at the dinner included Harry Boyer, president of the Pennsylvania Industrial Union Council, CIO; John Feigel, president of the Pittsburgh Central Labor Council, AFL; Anthony Federoff, president, Steel City Industrial Union Council; and Sidney Moyer of the Moyer Manufacturing Company, Youngstown, Ohio, speaking on behalf of the employers who deal with the Amalgamated.

Father Charles O. Rice delivered the invocation. Marie Georgiana, president of the Pittsburgh District Joint Board, extended greetings to those in attendance and introduced Sobczak as the toastmaster of the evening.

Earlier in the day, at a meeting of the joint board, Charles Dispensa, manager of the Scranton and Wilkes-Barre Joint Board, and Beryl Peppercorn, retired manager of the Cleveland Joint Board, were warmly applauded after brief talks.

Local 186 Fetes Member On Retirement

KINGSTON, N. Y.—A well-earned tribute was paid by the members of ACWA Local 186 here to Elizabeth Snyder on the occasion of her retirement.

Sister Snyder has been working in the plant of F. Jacobson & Sons, Inc., and for the past 12 years she has served the union and her co-workers as shop chairlady. She was also a member of the local's executive board and delegate to the Capitol District Joint Board, with which Local 186 is affiliated. Moreover, Sister Snyder became an active member when Local 186 was established in 1934 and practically from the first day she joined the union until her decision to retire, she worked tirelessly and relentlessly for the success of the local.

Recently, the members of the local together with the retired members and representatives of the F. Jacobson & Sons' firm tendered a testimonial dinner to her, held at Cuneo's Restaurant.

Tribute Paid by Managers

Charles J. Garrahan, manager of the Shirt, Leisurewear and Rainwear Workers of New York, and Edward Duval, manager of the Capitol District Joint Board, evaluated the outstanding work Sister Snyder has done in the many years she has been a member of the union.

Congratulations and thanks for all she has done for the local was offered to Sister Snyder by Rita Baker, business agent servicing the local. Mae Martaldo presented her with a U. S. Savings Bond on behalf of Local 186.

Sister Baker also read a congratulatory telegram from Gladys Dickason, ACWA vice-president.

Among the guests present were William Bookbinder, manager of F. Jacobson & Sons, Inc., Edward Dempski, manager of the stitching room; and Vida Prindle, forelady.

Best wishes for a long life and happiness were expressed by Bookbinder and Dempski, who also extended their thanks and appreciation for the co-operation and fair-mindedness shown by Sister Snyder in handling grievances during the years she was shop chairlady.

The arrangements committee for the dinner consisted of Jeannette Nagele, Mary Coughlin, and Katherine Myers.

Negotiations In Outerwear Are Prepared

Managers of joint boards who have under their jurisdiction shops engaged in the production of outerwear met with the General Officers on September 30 to the General Officers Jacob S. Potofagreement with the employers in that branch of the industry.

Present at the conference, in addition to the General Officers, Jacob S. Potofsky, president, and Frank Rosenblum, secretary-treasurer, were: Hyman Blumberg, executive vice-president, and vice-presidents Louis Hollander, Vincent LaCapria, Richard Brazier, Joseph Salerno, David J. Monas, and Sander Genis.

Also, Ed Schultheis, regional director, and the following joint board managers: Nick Marsella, St. Louis; Reuben Kamm, Milwaukee; Charles J. Garrahan, Shirt Makers Joint Board, New York; Charles Dispensa, Scranton-Wilkes Barre; Samuel Smith, Chicago; John Sobczak, Pittsburgh; and John Fiasconi, Boston.

Reports were submitted about the employment situation in the various outerwear markets and the prospects for the coming season. After an exchange of views and opinions it was unanimously decided to renew the agreement, and a conference will be arranged with the employers.

Laundry Retirees Hear Potofsky

A hearty welcome was extended to Jacob S. Potofsky, ACWA general president, by the retired members of the Laundry Workers Joint Board of New York, when he addressed their meeting on October 1. It was the inauguration of the second-year program of the Recreation Center.

Louis Simon, manager of the joint board and ACWA vice-president, joined with Mrs. Simon in welcoming every one in the audience and a number of invited guests. Mrs. Simon, the wife of the manager is hostess of the Recreation Center. He noted that of the 700 retired members of the organization the majority have taken advantage of the Center and its facilities. They have attended classes and lectures or spent the time in the Center watching TV or enjoying themselves at various appropriate games. He was proud that Mrs. Simon as hostess has done a fine job in making the Recreation Center an important institution.

Dr. Harry Levine, health commissioner of the City of New York, was the first speaker. Dr. Levine remarked that the enthusiasm manifested by the members in the Recreation Center last year shows the need for continuing it this year. He spoke of the importance of the retired members coming together and finding an outlet in this institution for their interests and creative activities. It is also important because the institution affords them an opportunity to exercise their minds, intelligence and personality, he said. Dr. Levine praised the union for the interest it is taking in the welfare of the retired people, "something that others don't do." With this he payed tribute to Mrs. Simon for the way she has been conducting the Recreation Center.

After a few words of welcome by Odell Clark, assistant manager of the joint board, Simon introduced Potofsky as the guest speaker.

Potofsky first explained the responsibilities of officers of a union and particularly of the ACWA stressing that the responsibilities of the president of the organization are especially great.

About the goals and aspirations of the Amalgamated, Potofsky explained that "we are concerned not only with the bread and butter of our members but with the economy of the country, with politics, legislation and with the social program that must be of concern to all citizens and particularly the working people."

He also referred to our relations with the communities in which the members live, and stressed that "as organized workers we believe in self-help and not in charity although we recognize that many people are in need of help by charitable institutions."

It was also pointed out by the speaker that the "Amalgamated takes an interest in international affairs and is concerned with minority groups for whom we seek justice."

Having been one of the two fraternal delegates from the AFL-CIO to the British Trade Unions Congress, held the first week in September, Potofsky briefly reviewed the deliberations at the Congress. Following this he gave his impressions of the young State of Israel which he also visited for the primary purpose of delivering a financial contribution from the American labor movement for the purpose of installing an air conditioning system in the Philip Murray Building, that has been established in Israel as a memorial to the late president of the CIO.

Potofsky told of the achievements of the State of Israel in its first ten years of existence and gave an evaluation of it as the arsenal of democracy in the Near East.

It was stressed by Potofsky that in England as well as in Israel he found no desire for war and told of the pressure on the government that is being exerted by the British Labor Party and trade unions not to get involved in any war.

Potofsky then turned his attention to the election to be held in our own country on November 4th. He explained that the outcome will have its effect on minimum wage legislation, social security, etc.

Noting that the present Republican Administration and the money barons are trying to give the impression that we have prosperity in the country, Potofsky pointed out that there is no sign of prosperity in the factories. Such problems as the economy of the country, minimum wage legislation, social security, and unemployment can be solved only by an Administration and leadership that is concerned with the welfare of the wage earners and of the nation as a whole, he stressed. It is a sad commentary on our country that under the present Administration we have some 5 million workers depending on relief and unemployment benefits. This can be remedied only by a change in the national Administration and to bring about such a change people must register and vote, Potofsky emphasized.

He also dealt with the matter of ethical practices in the labor movement. He was emphatic in stating that there is no room in the labor movement for crooks or dishonest people. The labor movement is basically an idealistic movement and it must be kept clean, which is the aim of the AFL-CIO. For that purpose the united labor movement promulgated codes, and he was glad to report that these codes are being adopted by more and more affiliates of the AFL-CIO.

Potofsky concluded by extending congratulations to the officers of the joint board for their achievements, pointing out that they brought order to an industry where chaos existed.

He urged the retired members to continue their "interest in the organization which is interested in you."

Introduced for bows at the opening of the session were Ida Daniels, from the New York Welfare Department, assisting Mrs. Simon in handling the Recreation Center; Milton Arons, administrative director of the Amalgamated Laundry Workers Health Center; Jack Harris, of the joint board's insurance department; staff members, and Jean Maxwell, former professor of social work at N.Y.U. and presently doing work for the National Committee for the Aging.

NY Laundry Wages and Some Insurance Provisions Raised

The delegates of the Amalgamated Laundry Workers Joint Board, at the meeting on October 2, were told by Louis Simon, manager and an ACWA vice-president, that the members received another wage increase and improvements in insurance on September 22, in accordance with provisions in the agreement negotiated with the various employers' associations of Greater New York in November, 1957.

Simon related that as the deadline approached for these additional improvements, representatives of all the associations requested that for the time being the union should agree to a delay. They based their request on the unsatisfactory business conditions in this service industry.

The union rejected their request after a joint study of conditions in the plants established that there was no justification for it.

The 1957 agreement, which remains in effect until December 1, 1962, provided for a series of increased minimum wage rates, part of which became effective on January 6, 1958, and an additional increase plus insurance improvements for some categories of workers to become effective on September 22. These new increases are as follows:

Inside production workers in the hand laundry division, except markers and sorters, received 5 cents an hour up to a maximum of $2 a week. The weekly wages of markers, sorters, and drivers were increased by $2 a week.

Other Rate Changes

The inside production workers in the other divisions received an increase in pay and hourly minimums of 5 cents per hour. The guaranteed weekly wage for female production and store workers in the family and wholesale division were increased to $39, and to $42 a week in the linen, flatwork and diaper divisions.

Wage rates and minimums for non-commission routemen in the linen, flatwork, and diaper division were increased by $3 a week.

For commission drivers in the family division, the guaranteed weekly earnings, based on a six-month average were increased to $70 a week.

Wages and minimum rates for engineers and maintenance men went up 10 cents an hour.

Office workers, who are now 100 per cent organized in the plants operating under union contract, received a wage increase along with an increase in the basic minimums of up to $2 a week. The statutory weekly minimum for office workers, as a result of this new increase, is $42.

Insurance Changes

Improvements in insurance benefits in certain categories also became effective on September 22. Workers employed in contract shops under union jurisdiction for at least three years and with earnings before September 22 of not less than $50 a week and up to $75 will be covered by $2,000 in life insurance. If their earnings were $75 a week and more, the insurance coverage was raised to $3,000.

The agreement also guarantees one more wage increase, effective on January 4, 1960.

Reporting on the recent increases, Simon emphasized that the present agreement was signed at the time when the industrial situation was disadvantageous to the union and the recession's effects were being felt.

The employers strenuously resisted the union's demand for improvements. All these obstacles were overcome, because Simon said "we have a unified, solidified and loyal membership and the employers knew that it was ready to support the demands with their organized power."

Report on Organizing

Continuing his report, Simon spoke of the organizing activities of the joint board and the great difficulties being encountered. He reported that employers are now taking advantage of the contaminated atmosphere created by the enemies of labor by using the disclosures by the McClellan Committee about graft and corruption in a few unions to create antagonism against all unions.

The employers now find it easier to get help from the courts. They are taking advantage of the Supreme Court decision that gave states the rights to impose penalties on unions — penalties that can ruin them financially.

Simon also pointed out that President Eisenhower gave encouragement to anti-union employers with his statement that it is up to the states to do as they please about "right-to-work" laws and the Federal Government has nothing to do with their decisions.

From this, the joint board manager declared, must be drawn the conclusion that labor must increase it political activities and, in the coming election, vote for candidates who will serve the interests of the workers in Congress, governor's office and state legislatures.

Discussing the depressed situation in the laundry industry in Greater New York, which adversely affects particularly the commission drivers, Simon spoke of the labor-management program initiated by the joint board and carried on jointly with management.

Sales Methods Being Taught

He said that classes were established to teach modern sales methods and a professor in this field was engaged to instruct the drivers in sales methods in an effort to increase the amount of work and their earnings.

Simon also discussed the viciousness of "right-to-work" laws, the question of desegregation in schools, with special reference to Little Rock, and related matters.

Speaking about the union's health center, Simon stressed its importance and how valuable an institution it can be if the members take advantage of its marvelous services.

He urged the delegates and staff members to speak to the people in the plants and explain to them that they will protect their health and prolong their lives if they use the facilities of the health center.

Odell Clark, assistant manager, related his experience in the drive to organize the unorganized. Clark spoke, too, about the difficulties explaining that they can be overcome if all members will cooperate with the officers. He joined Simon in urging the members to register if they have not yet done so, and to vote on November 4.

Roger Douglas, president of the joint board, chaired the meeting.

New Pact Signed In Rawlings Shops

ST. LOUIS, Mo.—Important new provisions incorporating substantial improvements were negotiated in the agreement that has just been renewed between the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America and the Rawlings Sporting Goods Company, covering some 900 members employed in the firm's plants in St. Louis, Newburg, and Licking, Mo. The plants are in the area under the direction of Richard Brazier, ACWA vice-president, who conducted the negotiations together with Nick Marsella, manager of the St. Louis Joint Board; Ralph Troisi and Clethra Divinagracia, business agents; and committees of workers from each of the three plants.

The new agreement will be in force until June, 1961. While no general increase was obtained, the agreement included such provisions as elimination of inequities that existed among the time workers in various classifications. This resulted, Brazier said, in wage increases ranging from 5 to 20 cents an hour affecting approximately 150 time work employees in the three plants.

Increases for New Employees

The company also agreed to a progressive system of increases for new employees, specifying a 7 cents an hour increase after 30 days' employment, after which they are required, under the union shop agreement, to join the union. Following that, an increase of 5 cents an hour will be given them each 90 days until the top scale in each classification is reached.

The agreement also provides for an automatic wage increase of 5 cents per hour to all employees, effective September 1, 1959, and for a reopening of the welfare program. On any or all economic issues, the agreement can be reopened in September, 1960.

Among the other improvements gained by the union are a seventh paid holiday and a third week's paid vacation to employees with 12 years of service instead of 15 years as was the case heretofore. The firm also agreed to a jury service pay clause whereby an employee will be paid the difference between what he receives as a juror and what he would have earned in the plant.

All details of the agreement were reported to the members of the St. Louis plant by Marsella and Troisi at a meeting on September 24. The pact was unanimously ratified. The agreement was presented to the workers in the Licking and Newburg plants by Sister Divinagracia and was likewise unanimously ratified.

Serving on the negotiations committee from each shop were Glenn Counts, Ernie Whitmore, James Parrish, Irene Whitener, Eve Allen, Daisy Bush, Dorothy Schroeder, and Mike Salamone, St. Louis plant; Vernon Ingram, Alta Mitchell, Avery Ormsbee, and Velema Robertson, Licking; and Don Yelton, Alice Alexander, and Geneva Burris, Newburg.

Willow Springs Workers Sign ACWA Cards

WILLOW SPRINGS, Mo.—The Willow Springs plant of the Rawlings Sporting Goods Company is on the threshold of being brought under collective bargaining agreement with the Amalgamated. Negotiations for a contract are to commence shortly.

Workers in the company's three other plants are enjoying the benefits of an ACWA contract.

On September 19, Richard Brazier, ACWA vice-president and director of the St. Louis region, assigned Gladys Cohn and Ruth Kincy to organize the Willow Springs' workers. After contacting a number of Rawling's workers, a meeting was held on September 21 to form an organizing commitee.

On the following Monday morning, a leaflet, with an application card attached, was distributed to the workers in the front of the plant, advising them of the benefits being enjoyed by the workers in the firm's other three plants operating under a union agreement.

Mass Meeting Held

By noon on the same day, 45 workers had signed union application cards. Their number was doubled on the following day. At the request of the workers a meeting was held on September 27 at the American Legion Hall. It was addressed by Ralph Troisi, business representative of the St. Louis Joint Board, who services the St. Louis plant of that firm. About 150 workers attended.

Troisi explained the benefits being enjoyed by the workers in the firm's three unionized plants, such as paid vacation, paid holidays, insurance coverage, retirement pension, and pay for jury service. Troisi told of the other clauses in the standard Amalgamated agreements that guarantee time and one-half pay for overtime work, four hours' reporting time pay, grievance adjustments, arbitration, etc.

The organizing committee reported that 175 out of approximately 230 workers had signed union application cards. On the basis of this report a negotiation committee was elected, composed of Doris Finley, Ted Elmore, Gene Freeman, Mabel Durbin, and Ira Dougherty.

Following this, Brazier met with the firm regarding union recognition for the Willow Springs plant. The company agreed to a card check. If it shows that a majority is for the ACWA, a date will be set for negotiations.

Textile Workers To Seek Pact From the Inside

The textile workers, on strike against the P.H. Hanes Knitting Company in Winston-Salem, N.C., have voted to return to work and continue their campaign for a union contract from inside the plant. At the same time, the Textile Workers Union asks support of AFL-CIO affiliates in continuing the boycott of Hanes products "until such time as the company stops its union-busting activities."

The products, which labor has been asked to boycott, are Hanes T-Shirts, Hanes Underwear and Hanes Hosiery.

The workers are continuing their fight to secure a decent contract with the company. Thus far, the firm has refused to sign a new agreement containing provisions for arbitration and the checkoff, although these provisions have been a part of the contract in the plant for the past 14 years.

In asking the support of organized labor to boycott Hanes products, the Textile Workers Union expressed confidence that the effect of such a program will ultimately succeed in making the company "come to terms."

Dean Griswold Discusses Union of South Africa

Government Uses Apartheid To Exploit Labor, Suppress Freedom, Deny Human Rights

By C. Edmund Fisher

At this very moment, 91 lawyers, doctors, clergymen, teachers, workers, and housewives in the Union of South Africa are on trial for their lives. The charge is treason. Their "crime" is peaceful opposition to the government's policy of apartheid, or white supremacy in the strictest sense. They want only democracy.

Who are these defendants? What have they really done? What are they fighting for? What social and legal significance does this cause celebre have for the rest of the world, many of whose leading peoples have expressed shock and dismay over the Union of South Africa's deliberate plunge into the jungle of racism? And what, if any, parallel situation exists in the United States?

The Sidney Hillman Foundation, established in memory of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America's first president, sought answers to those questions. Under its sponsorship, and with the cooperation of the American Committee on Africa, Erwin N. Griswold, dean of he Harvard Law School, went to the Union of South Africa this past summer and spent more than a month in concentrated study.

What he found in private conversations with government and opposition leaders, with legal authorities and the men-on-the-street of the various races, and from poring over more than 10,000 documents submitted as evidence — from all these sources he established basic opinions that he expressed at a press conference in New York City on September 30 and at a luncheon for civic leaders the following day and sponsored by the Sidney Hillman Foundation and the American Committee of Africa.

"You have to see it to believe it," dean Griswold said of oppressive human conditions in South Africa. Yet, from his remarks a clear cut picture can be drawn of the painstakingly conspired anti-social structure existing in that dominion within the British Commonwealth.

Outlook Is Bleak

One thing stood out sharply — the outlook for a reversal of the government's position on apartheid is extremely bleak. In fact, by law, the minority white group (it numbers less than 3 million out of a population of 13 million) has so rigged the framework of apartheid since it swelled into a major issue 10 years ago that it is virtually impregnable.

Armed revolt as a means of achieving democracy is virtually impossible. Under the law, only the whites have guns. Also, they make up the police and armed forces, and, of course, the government. An African or colored (a person of mixed descent) faces severe punishment for possession of firearms.

On top of that, most of the key opposition leaders — whites, Negroes, and Indians — are immobilized and will be that way for a long time to come by the very nature of their being on trial.

Suppression of fundamental human liberties is the crux of apartheid. "Licensed peonage" is what dean Griswold called it.

An African worker may not join a union, may not strike, may not quit his job, and may not stay home from work for a day or so. If his absence is due to sickness, he must prove it. If he can't he is subject to arrest.

"This country's economy is built on exploitation of labor," dean Griswold explained. An unskilled worker earns about $8 a week. A miner collects about 50 cents a day, plus lodging and medical care.

An African must carry his "reference book." This must contain the signature of his employer and proof of tax payments. Natives frequently are stopped by police for book inspection. Lol the poor soul who doesn't have his reference book or if it is not in order. He is promptly arrested.

This is the background of the inhuman conditions that prompted a handful of daring individuals to speak out against the government's policy of beating down some 80 per cent of the people living in South Africa.

Gestapo Tactics Jail Innocent

On the night of December 4, 1956, these leaders went to their beds in the four provinces of the 48-year-old dominion unaware that their time for freedom was numbered in hours. As the dawn broke the next morning, they were roused and trundled off to incarceration in Johannesburg in a series of raids that smacked of gestapo secrecy and suddenness.

For the next 13 months, while free under bail, they nonetheless underwent day-in-day-out questioning in preliminary hearings. Sixty-five were released, but 91 went to trial this past August 1 in the capital city of Pretoria. Dean Griswold feels that the trial will last a year, possibly longer.

It is dean Griswold's opinion that the trial itself will be fair, and that, most likely, none will get the death penalty from the three-judge court, which, like the country itself, operates under minority rule. A not-guilty decision by only one jurist automatically frees the defendent.

However, the court's conclusion must depend ultimately upon the law, and the law is most oppressive. As a general pattern, he pointed out, whenever South African courts do make a liberal decision concerning the civil rights of the people, the legislature then passes a law which negates the decision.

The treason charges against the defendents were based on their convening a Congress of the People, which adopted a freedom charter along democratic principles, and for speeches and writings against the Native Resettlement Act, the Bantu Education Act, and the Group Areas Act. Those laws established living and work ghettos, put schools under government control and closed missionary schools for natives. A charge of communism has since been dropped.

During the four years preceding their arrests, no acts of violence were committed by the leaders, dean Griswold said. In fact, the tenor was against violence in favor of peaceful opposition.

Feeding Ground For Racists

Because these people were jailed simply because of their outspoken demands for democracy, individuals and groups in other democratic nations have lifted indignant voices. They see in this suppression of civil liberties and rights a feeding ground for racists elsewhere, plus a first class talking point by communists in the underdeveloped countries of Africa and Asia.

The ruling minority group in the Union of South Africa is sensitive to this, dean Griswold said. Despite its blustering — and boycotting many United Nations sessions dealing with the problem and quitting the UN's Educational, Social and Cultural Organization about two years ago — this minority group is on the defensive.

Dean Griswold noted that dominion newspapers give as much, if not greater, space to Little Rock and other integration problems in our own South as they do to their own treason trial. This, he said, is obviously a defensive mechanism in an attempt to show that other people in advanced societies, such as that which exists in the United States, practice segregation.

Although there are extremists in the U.S. who would revel in being able to establish a white supremacy form of government here, he feels that their ever doing so is quite remote because of legal safeguards.

Dean Griswold pointed out that there are vast legal differences in the United States and the Union of South Africa. Here, there is the Bill of Rights, due process under the law, and habeas corpus proceedings. In South Africa, there is no bill of rights and no due process, while habeas corpus is more of a gesture than a reality in assuring that a person can be released from jail.

He asserted that another primary difference between the two countries is in education. Well over 60 per cent of the dominion's population, he said, is African. Of that population majority, he estimated that 90 per cent is primitive and without classroom education. The urbanity of the remaining 10 per cent ranges from low to high.

Indians Are Persecuted

He noted also still another group, known as the colored, who are of mixed descent. These are in the minority, and suffer the same indignities from apartheid. He pointed to the plight of the Indians, practically all of whom are second and third generation residents of the Union of South Africa. These people, he said, have been the leading traders. Now, under apartheid, they are practically stripped of their livelihoods.

"What is being done in South Africa," he said, "is morally unsound. I can add that it is sociologically unsound."

He urged that every civilized person —that is, individuals with a basic education—be given the right to vote. This attitude parallels the liberal view in South Africa, but as it stands now, liberals are few and far between. Even many who oppose the government keep quiet, fearful that they, too, will be arrested for treason.

A drawback to cultural advancement is of course the fact that so few people have a book-learning background, with the result that an articulate, yet bigoted, populace has taken command.

While dean Griswold said that South Africa's only hope for a democratic form of government is through a drastic change in educational and economic methods, he could draw no hope that such a reversal would come in the foreseeable future.

One possibility of a change could stem from the sensitivity of the white minority about world opinion. While dean Griswold did not explore that avenue during the interview, nevertheless there is hope, admittedly slender, that a strengthening of world opinion could break through the pigmentation curtain that the white minority in the Union of South Africa has so deliberately and ruthlessly drawn around itself.

ACW Wins Election In LA Shop

LOS ANGELES—Workers employed by Valley Togs, a men's sportswear plant located in Van Nuys, by a vote of 43 to 34, favored affiliation with the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America in an election conducted by the National Labor Relations Board on September 23.

Valley Togs is a division of the firm of George Aftergood & Son, which also manufactures in Los Angeles proper.

On being informed of the victory, Jerome Posner, manager of the Los Angeles joint board, said, "We are very pleased with the fact that the workers of Valley Togs are anxious to be covered by the benefits made possible through unionization. We will make every effort to consummate a union contract as quickly as possible so that our new members will be able to enjoy such union benefits as paid holidays, paid vacations, insurance benefits, union security and the other improvements already enjoyed by the 7,000 Amalgamated members in this area."

Organization director Griselda Kuhlman and organizer Antonio Pena conducted the campaign on behalf of the union.

Clark Put On Housing Panel

Odell Clark, assistant manager of the Amalgamated Laundry Workers Joint Board, was appointed by mayor Robert F. Wagner of New York City as a member of the Fair Housing Practice Panel authorized by the Sharkey-Brown-Isaacs Law.

The law makes illegal any discrimination because of race, color, religion or national origin in the sale or lease of multiple dwelling housing space and one and two-family housing developments of ten or more units.

The panel will serve as an appeals board to review cases of alleged discrimination or segregation in violation of the law. The members will serve without pay.

Other members of the panel named with Clark are: Max Abramovitz, architect; Victor F. Condello, lawyer; Morris Crawford, Jr., bank vice-president; The Reverend Edler G. Hawkins, Presbyterian minister; Lazarus Joseph, former New York City controller; Rabbi Edward E. Klein, of the Stephen Wise Free Synagogue; James S. Lanigan, lawyer; Paul O'Keefe, president of a real estate firm; Lawrence W. Pierce, assistant district attorney; Mrs. Jerome L. Strauss, women's club president; and Mrs. Ronald Tree, former director of the National Urban League.

The Education Department Reports:

Jersey Local Works Up $ Campaign for APEC

An illustration of how to help raise voluntary political contributions by using new methods was given recently in Local 126, Elizabeth and Perth Amboy, N.J. Manager James Messina and Connie Petio, business agent for the local, consulted with the ACWA national education department in order to present a new way of collecting APEC (Amalgamated Political Education Committee) dollars. Emil Starr, national educatoin director, met first of all with the shop chairmen from all the various shops in those cities. He explained to them the functioning of APEC—how the monies are spent — and impressed on them the need for political action and education in view of the drive by big business, now in the open, to fight organized labor's political role.

He discussed with them at length the do's and don't's of raising dollars in the shops and how specifically to use the new APEC leaflet that is available for general distribution to all locals and joint boards.

In it, labor's program for a better America is described. Armed with the leaflets and information concerning APEC, the shop chairmen proceeded to circulate the APEC books in the shop.

Labor In Politics

The following week a stronger effort was made in Elizabeth and Perth Amboy at local and shop meetings. The film, "Labor's Witness," was shown to the general membership. This film, produced by the United Auto Workers, shows president Walter Reuther defending labor's right to participate in politics through registration drives, endorsement of candidates and financial contributions before the Core Senate Subcommittee on Election Expenditures.

Starr led a discussion on the film and pointed out the tremendous drive that big business is putting on this year in behalf of the candidates of their choosing.

For example, he said, Gulf Oil Co. had sent a letter to its 151,000 stockholders, dealers and executives in which senior vice-president Archie Gray stated:

"If we are to survive, labor's political power must be now opposed by matching force, and there is no place in the U.S. where such a force can be generated except among corporations that make up American business."

Starr also pointed out the manner in which the labor movement endorses candidates on their record in Congress rather than on any political stripe or label.

Messina also spoke at these meetings and announced that Harrison (Pete) Williams, Democratic candidate for the U.S. Senate and endorsed by the state CIO, would soon visit the shops. He praised Williams' record in the Eighty-third Congress and alluded to Republican Congressman Kean's opposition to a meaningful unemployment compensation bill in the House of Representatives. Kean is the GOP Senate candidate.

Messina also described the efforts of big business, through the Chamber of Commerce, to promote "right-to-work" laws in six more states, that hate merchants such as Joseph Kamp are attracted to the bandwagon of Senator Knowland's gubernatorial campaign in California because of their mutual hatred of labor. This type of smear campaign is reminiscent of the campaign levelled at the late president of the Amalgamated, Sidney Hillman, when he headed up the CIO-Political Action Committee in 1944. Messina said that the American worker is too clever to be fooled by this type of fear propaganda.

Messina reported that the APEC campaign was successful this year and that collections were made a good deal easier for the shop chairmen by the explanation of labor's political role and the stake that working men and women have in politics.

Hathaway Pact Renewed For 3 Years

WATERVILLE, Me.—Among the latest events in the life of the Amalgamated organization in New England, under the direction of Joseph Salerno, ACWA vice-president, is the renewal of agreement with the shirt-producing firm of C. F. Hathaway Company.

This firm has plants in Waterville and in Lowell, Mass. They have been operating under a union agreement for many years and the relationship between the union and the firm is of a very high calibre. It is, therefore, no surprise that the renewal of agreement was consummated through peaceful negotiations that were carried on in both cities.

The agreement is for a three-year period. The conditions prescribed follow the pattern set by the national negotiations between the Amalgamated and shirt manufacturers throughout the country. The most important provision is that the question of wages and fringe benefits can be reopened on February 1, 1959, and on February 1 of each succeeding year.

Another provision is for a joint labor-management study of severance pay and continued studies of the insurance and retirement programs with a view of reaching a settlement for necessary improvements.

The terms of agreement renewal were discussed by Salerno with 55 officers and executive board members of the six Amalgamated locals in Maine. This meeting was held the night before the conference between the union and the firm so that Salerno, who headed the negotiating committee of workers in the plants, had a clear understanding with them on terms to be agreed upon.

At this meeting Salerno saluted the members of the six locals for the sizeable contribution they made to the election of liberal candidates in that state.

The agreement with the Hathaway company was presented to the employees at a special meeting at which unanimous ratification was voted. The meeting was opened by Rodney Tupper, of Local 486. Guy Capizzi, business agent servicing these shops, presided.

Capizzi assisted Salerno in the negotiations together with a committee of workers comprising Tupper, president; Raymond Best, secretary-treasurer; Vince Arsenault, chief steward; Hilda Pepin, Andrew Pepin, Miss Louise Meunier, Marie Barber, Edna Doyon, Madeline Hamilton, Richard Boutin, Lucille Roy, Lionel Duperry, Yvonne Lampron, and Loretta Jones, for the Waterville plant.

For the plant in Lowell, the negotiating committee, that was headed by Salerno, included Ruth Sullivan, president; Richard Roberto, vice-president; Eleanor Brennan, secretary-treasurer; Dorothy Parker, Cecile Roy, Edna DuCharme, Margaret King, Dora Medina, Grace Eklund, and Jane Smith.

Besides the ratification of the agreement by the Hathaway employees, it was also unanimously ratified at a special meeting of the local.

A dinner, with Alvaro Ferreira, business agent, presiding, followed the education conference. Dancing completed the evening.

Kennedy, vice-president of Hathaway; and Joseph Salerno, ACWA vice-president and New England regional director; standing, Raymond Best, secretary, Local 486; Guy Capizzi, business agent; and Vince Arsenault, chief steward, Local 486.

Julia Monas Dies; Pioneer in Penna. Shirt Organizing

The General Officers, members of the General Executive Board, and officers and the entire membership of the Pennsylvania Shirt Workers Joint Board were shocked by the sudden death of Julia Monas, the wife of David J. Monas, manager of the joint board and an ACWA vice-president.

Jule, as she was affectionately called by all those with whom she was associated in the organization, died late Monday afternoon, October 6, in New York Hospital, New York City.

She was taken to the hospital on Sunday with what was supposed to have been a virus, from which she had been suffering for several weeks. She took a turn for the worse the following morning and died later in the day.

Julia Monas

The late Sister Monas was born on February 5, 1902, in Poland and went to Canada with her parents as a young child. The family settled in Oshawa, Ontario, where Jule received her elementary education. She later studied in the University of Toronto. Not only was she a good student, but was dynamic and imaginative.

In the middle 1920's she became an organizer for the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, filling assignments in various cities. As she spoke fluent Polish, her services were particularly valuable in situations where the union had a considerable number of Polish clothing workers.

In 1932, the ACWA initiated an organizing drive among the shirt workers in Pennsylvania. Jule Lesnick, which was her maiden name, was among the first organizers assigned to that drive. She was in the real sense a pioneer of the shirt makers' organization in that state, requiring on her part remarkable courage and fearlessness. The foundation for it was laid at a meeting in her house.

Even the brutality of Pennsylvania's mounted police of that time couldn't frighten her, nor would she be intimidated by the unscrupulous employers of those days.

On picket lines, at meetings of strikers, and among the shirt workers in general in that area, she quickly established herself as one of the highly respected and admired union representatives.

When the first local of shirt workers was organized in Allentown and an office was established, from which the organizing drive was directed, Jule became business agent and was placed in charge of the office. She continued to serve in that capacity for some years after Monas became manager of the joint board. They were married in 1935.

She later relinquished the office, but her keen interest in the organization and its activities continued until her death.

Side by side with her husband, she was always ready and anxious to assist in whatever work she could make herself helpful. It can be truly said that the joint board's Recreation and Cultural Center in Cornwall, Pa., is her creation.

Her husband sustained a tragic loss in her death, as did the Pennsylvania organization and the Amalgamaated as a whole.

In addition to her husband, Sister Monas is survived by her mother, Mrs. Balbina Lesnick, of Oshawa; three brothers, Edmund, of Centralia, Ontario, and Kashmir and Edward Lesnick, of Oshawa; and three sisters, Mary Mayshack, who is in charge of the joint board office in Allentown; Stella Attersley, of Winnipeg, and Victoria Shellenkoff, of Oshawa.

The leadership of the Amalgamated, in behalf of the membership, extended sincerest sympathy to the family.

Funeral services were held on Thursday, October 9, in Allentown, at which time the deceased was eulogized by Jacob S. Potofsky, ACWA general president, and others. She was buried in Oshawa.

TAKING THE OATH: Massachusetts Governor Foster Furcolo administers the oath of office to ACWA vice-president Joseph Salerno as Mrs. Salerno smiles happily. Salerno was appointed to the Massachusetts State Board of Education by the Governor.

Salerno Named To Board Of Education in Mass.

BOSTON—Honor was paid indirectly to the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America through Joseph Salerno, vice-president, when he was appointed by Massachusetts Governor Foster Furcolo to the Massachusetts State Board of Education. Salerno is also ACWA New England regional director.

Outstanding is the fact that the appointment of Salerno to the state board of education is the first one ever made in the New England area of a labor leader to this board. It represents another example of Governor Furcolo's liberal program in all walks of life.

It is recognized that in appointing Salerno, the governor also honored the board of education in that the Amalgamated vice-president has devoted much of his life to encouraging the growth and development of the educational system.

It is also recognized by those who worked with Salerno through the years of his participation in Amalgamated activities and in the general labor movement that he will make a real contribution to the state board of education because he is well versed on political and economic matters. He is a man of independent thinking, well read and never relaxes in his activities.

Governor Furcolo's appointment met with popular response from leaders in labor as well as civic leaders.

This was confirmed by the many congratulatory letters, telegrams and telephone calls Salerno has received on his appointment to the state board of education.

The Massachusetts Board of Education is the major agency for administering a budget of over $75,000,000 per year. It sets policy for 11 colleges and universities and all of the school system of the State.

In addition to the presidents and professors of the various colleges over 36,000 school teachers in the state look to the board of education for guidance.

From the early days of the labor movement when labor led the fight for free public schools to the present time, unions have taken a strong interest in public education.

Salerno's appointment is a recognition of the high regard in which he is held.

Present when Salerno was sworn in by Governor Furcolo, in addition to his wife and his son, Guy Salerno, were a large crowd of well wishers including among others: Hugh Thompson, AFL-CIO New England regional director, and Mrs. Thompson; J. William Belanger, president of the Massachusetts State CIO Industrial Union Council and Mrs. Belanger; Joseph Fiascone, manager of the Boston Joint Board and Mrs. Fiascone; Salvatore Camelio, New England director of the United Rubber Workers; Earl Riley, president of District No. 1 of the IUE; Paul Loreck, secretary-treasurer of the Boston Joint Board; Al Clifton, legislative agent; Joseph Cass, political action director; and Berry Aronson, community services representative, all of the Massachusetts State CIO Industrial Union Council; Guy Campobasso, business agent of the Boston Joint Board; Val Murphy, business agent of the Utility Workers Union; Arthur DiPietro, organizer of the Auto Workers; Dolores Umana, secretary to Governor Furcolo; and Harvey L. Friedman, New England education director.

Local 4 Reports High Registration

A strong appeal to register and vote in the November 4 election was made at a membership meeting of New York Clothing Cutters Local 4 by Samuel Cohen, manager.

An overflow crowd attended the meeting on October 2 in the auditorium of the Shirt Makers Joint Board. Sy Nathanson presided. The minutes of the previous meeting and of executive board meetings were read by Harry Ellan, recording secretary.

Cohen reported that the industrial situation is far from satisfactory. However, all cutters have jobs, even though there are some shops where work is lacking. He reminded the shop chairmen that they must not be negligent about reporting to the office about the work cut. This must be done before the work is made up in the tailor shops.

Cohen also instructed the shop chairmen to be prompt in reporting people laid off so that their vacation pay can be collected.

Needle trade classes have been started, Cohen said, advising the cutters wishing to attend to register immediately.

In connection with forthcoming elections, Cohen noted that in spite of assurances by government agencies that unemployment is decreasing, there are still more than 5,000,000 out of work, and the cost of living is higher than ever. The government is doing nothing to alleviate the situation.

This, he explained, is because "we have a government by and for big business. It is tragic that we have a government with a President at the head of it who doesn't know how to stop a recession that was created by their own people."

While this is going on, the reactionary forces keep on attacking the labor movement, Cohen said. They are making every effort to have Congress adopt stronger anti-labor legislation than Taft-Hartley, he said. He also referred to the fact that corruption in a few unions is being used by the enemies of labor to discredit all unions.

Cohen said that the way to counteract this is to make the people realize that the labor movement as a whole is clean and idealistic, and to make the workers understand that, to protect their unions, they must be active in the political field as they are in the economic field.

"The laws we get in the future depend on who is elected to Congress," he stated. "This can be determined by the people themselves, and the one way to elect proper representatives to protect the interests of the working people is for the workers themselves to register and vote."

Cohen stated that a checkup showed that a good percentage of members of Local 4 are registered. However, this is not good enough, he said.

Cohen reminded the members that an election campaign can be carried on successfully only when sufficiently financed. He urged the members to live up to their pledge of making a voluntary contribution of $2 to the Amalgamated Political Education Committee (APEC).

Potofsky on Visit Abroad—

Labor Government In England Soon, Israel Impressive

An early return of a labor government in England and almost unbelievable progress in Israel were among the impressions Jacob S. Potofsky, general president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, brought home from a trip abroad.

Potofsky and George M. Harrison, president of the Railway Clerks, were in England as fraternal delegates from the AFL-CIO to the British Trades Union Congress. Later, they went to Israel to participate in the dedication of the William Green Cultural Center in Haifa. They also were the first official AFL-CIO delegation to Israel since the state was founded 10 years ago.

Before returning home, Potofsky also stopped off in Italy, where he made a representation to the Italian Government in behalf of the Organization for Rehabilitation Through Training (ORT), to which the Amalgamated has contributed regularly.

As a fraternal delegate, he addressed the Trades Union Congress at Bournemouth (see "The Advance," September 15, 1958), and observed the British trade union movement in action at a convention.

British Labor Powerful

"British labor," he said on his return to New York City, "is a powerful movement, and I would not be surprised at all to see a labor government in Britain in the near future."

With unemployment rising in Great Britain, the trade union movement there, as the AFL-CIO has done in the United States, offered constructive solutions. British labor takes considerable interest in international affairs and in the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, Potofsky said as he drew another parallel between the British and American trade union movements.

"British unionists," he stated, "are concerned over Quemoy and Matsu lest we get into another war."

One difference between the two movements is found in operational structure, he said. "Here, many of the issues are thrashed out in committee with a minimum of floor debate. In the Trades Union Congress, considerable time is given to floor debate before resolving the issues."

Potofsky had several talks with the leaders of the National Union of Tailors & Garment Workers — J. E. Newton, Davis, Dame Loughlin, the delegation of the garment workers attending the TUC. They tendered a dinner in his honor at Bournemouth.

He reported an interest in the Amalgamated's union label. As the British people more and more accept the media of advertising, the Tailors & Garment Workers' executives are considering the introduction of a union label and expressed a keen desire to get the facts on operations of the union label in the United States.

Potofsky was in England during the race riots and observed that British courts handed down severe punishment to the individuals involved.

He and Harrison went directly to Israel to participate in the William Green Cultural Center dedication. The building will serve Haifa's 160,000 trade unionists. It was named in honor of the late AFL president.

"We were both impressed with the astounding progress made by that tiny bastion of democracy in the Middle East," Potofsky said.

"The success in developing a nation, a language, strong army, and a democratic, stable labor movement is outstanding evidence of what can be accomplished by a people devoted to a cause, principles, and ideals of establishing a homeland for the Jews.

"I was in Israel nine and a half years ago and it is beyond comprehension what the people have since accomplished."

Recalling that he walked "the same road that Moses did on his way from Egypt to Mt. Sinai," Potofsky said that he "witnessed the installation of the new oil pipeline and I saw sturdy men actually moving mountains to establish the new port of Elath. The Philip Murray Community Building is the center of all activities. It overlooks the Red Sea.

From Desert to Fertile Soil

"They have virtually converted the rock and the sand that had lain idle for centuries into fertile soil. They produce fruits and vegetables and, in the cities, manufactured goods not only for themselves but for export. They are now busy converting the desert into thriving communities.

"Not only have the people of Israel vitalized the barren land and built industries, but they have also welcomed the refugees from all over the world; and these refugees have become an integral part of the life and commerce of the country.

"Everywhere we sensed a feeling of optimism and confidence," Potofsky went on. "Everywhere we felt an urgency to accomplish the impossible, and everywhere we felt a desire for peace."

He gave Histadrut (The Israel federation of labor) a great deal of credit for the building up of the country in addition to protecting the standards and welfare of the workers who number more than 600,000.

"In Haifa, Jerusalem and Elath, there are labor mayors, signifying the important role labor is playing in the upbuilding of the nation.

"I was literally thrilled beyond words with what I saw in Israel, and heard and felt there. It was an unforgettable visit and experience. The country is growing: factories, apartments, government buildings, and institutions of all sorts are springing up everywhere; the roads and streets are crowded."

While in Israel, Potofsky met with its president, Yitzhak Ben-Zvi; the prime minister, David Ben-Gurion; the foreign minister, Golda Meir; the minister of labor, Mordecai Namir; and many others with the government and labor, including Pinhas Lavon, secretary general of Histadrut, and its entire executive board.

He also visited many institutions, among them the Amal School, ORT, and Jerusalem University.

He left Israel with a distinct impression that the government and the people are dedicated to peace. Constant threats from hostile neighbors have made it necessary for this small state to build an effective army.

"The people are concerned with peace and the development of their country along with relations and trade with such friendly nations as Turkey, Ghana, the Sudan, and the Far East," Potofsky emphasized. They look to the U.S. for protection of their borders and are grateful for their co-operation."

In Italy, he visited with many old friends. One of these is Monsignor John Patrick Carroll-Abbing, founder of Boys' Towns of Italy. Together, they visited the new Boys' Town on the outskirts of Rome.

"What an institution," Potofsky exclaimed. "Fifty wayward and retarded youngsters are being rehabilitated and taught a trade."

He visited workshops and the farms, and saw them at work and play.

Plans for Amalgamated School

Monsignor Carroll-Abbing has plans for an Amalgamated school and more workshops to add to the Boys' Towns of Italy that through the years, and with the help of many organizations, including the ACWA, has taken in orphans, children from broken homes and children with psychiatric quirks to rehabilitate them and send them out, fit and ready, to make their way in a democratic society.

A representative of ORT, which operates non-sectarian vocational schools for 1,500 Italian boys, asked Potofsky to intercede with the Italian Government for additional equipment for the schools as well as the ORT administration.

Potofsky arranged to see the minister of labor, Ezio Vigorelli, who expressed sympathy for the appeal and promised his support. Vigorelli, an old friend of ACWA vice-president August Bellanca, reminisced about the problems attendant on the rehabilitation of Italy after the war and noted the many contributions the Amalgamated and some of its affiliates made toward that end.

Vigorelli displayed a keen interest in the United States, particularly the current recession, effects of which are being felt in Europe.

DEDICATION IN ISRAEL: Jacob S. Potofsky (right), general president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, and George M. Harrison, president of the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks, stand beneath the inscription of the William Green Cultural Center in Haifa, Israel. They dedicated the Center, which will serve Haifa's 160,000 trade unionists. It was built with the help of the William Green Memorial Foundation, which, through president George Meany, who is also AFL-CIO president, donated $50,000 for that purpose.

Eight Families Donate More Funds to Politics Than Did All of Labor

A recent report of the Committee on Political Education (COPE) reveals that eight families in America contributed more money to candidates in the 1956 elections than the entire labor movement.

COPE announced this information at the same time they released their July report to the various international unions of the AFL-CIO.

"When only eight families can contribute more to their favorite candidates and issues than 16 million members of the AFL-CIO the need for the COPE dollar drive is obvious," say COPE officials.

The Du Ponts, Pews, Rockefellers, Whitneys, Mellons, Vanderbilts, Olins and Reynoldses spent $1,004,986. The entire labor movement spent $941,271.

"Elections," says COPE, "are not won by money alone. They are won by organization, and most of all by the devoted service of people who believe in a righteous cause.

"But," COPE continues, "radio, television, advertising, publications and other necessary items all take money, and a candidate is greatly handicapped without it.

"We never expect to match the billionaires, and we don't have to," COPE says, "because we know some better ways of pulling together. But, unless we people who do the hard work in this country can boost the wherewithall of political life for our kind of candidate, the wealthy few will out-elect us far too often."

THIS IS WHY LABOR IS IN POLITICS

Labor Law
EPV

THE FOLLOWING STORY WAS PUBLISHED IN THE WALL STREET JOURNAL ON FEB. 26, 1958

By ROSCOE BORN
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON—The Government, in a complete reversal of a 10-year-old policy, quietly has given the nation's powerful building trades unions an ultimatum that will cut severely into their job-control power.

The ultimatum orders the unions to drop their closed shop requirement, which forces employers to hire only union members, and other illegal hiring practices. The order comes from the National Labor Relations Board, the Government's referee in labor-management disputes.

Though the Taft-Hartley law banned the closed shop in 1947, the ban has been widely disregarded in the building industry. Until recently, the N.L.R.B. had winked at violations, except in a few cases where workers pushed complaints.

Pressure on Unions

To bring further pressure on the unions, the board also has directed employers to steer clear of the illegal hiring arrangements in their contracts or share in the consequences.

Both the employers and the unions have been told they will be held equally responsible for compliance. Under a special weapon devised by N.L.R.B. officials, both will face heavy monetary loss or contempt-of-court charges if they don't comply by June 1.

"They mean business," declares an official of the Associated General Contractors of America, an organization representing some 7,000 construction employers in 48 states and Alaska. "It's for the mutual benefit of both labor and management and we intend to make our agreements conform to the law."

And a labor lawyer predicts: "The stakes are too large. The unions are not going to object to going along."

Easier to Evade

Traditionally, the closed shop clause has been found in many building-trades contracts, although no one knows just how many. Despite the 1947 ban, "the building trades have gone on with their closed shop just as if Taft-Hartley had never been passed," one official at the N.L.R.B. complains. Though union and management men in the industry contend this view is exaggerted, they admit they haven't really complied with the law because they found it easier not to.

This same official insists the N.L.R.B. winked at violations before because of "the make-up of the board under Harry Truman," who bitterly opposed the Taft-Hartley Law. By 1957, the Eisenhower Administration had whittled Truman holdovers on the five-member board down to one man, Abe Murdock. When his term expired last December, Mr. Murdock was replaced, too. As ex-President Truman's influence weakened and finally vanished, the board swung into action on the closed shop, this board official claims.

Technically, the action isn't the board's at all, but is that of the N.L.R.B. general counsel. The board sits as a judicial body, aloof from prosecution, leaving that job to the counsel, who is appointed independently by the President. That's why there's been no official announcement of the policy change by the board.

Counsel Acts

"We told the general counsel what our thinking was, and he's going to do it," says a board official.

The counsel, Jerome Fenton, has just dispatched a letter to the contractors and to Richard J. Gray, President of the A.F.L.-C.I.O. Building Trades Department, whose member unions total 18, including the carpenters, plumbers, bricklayers and operating engineers.

Mr. Fenton's letter says it would be "preferable if the parties took it upon themselves to correct their illegal hiring arrangements, thereby achieving the same basic purpose sought by the board but without the necessity of board action.

"Such over-all elimination of illegal hiring arrangements, by voluntary action, would not only help effectuate the purposes of the (Taft-Hartley) act, but would clearly be an important step in the general public interest and in the furtherance of the fundamental rights of employes," the letter continues.

'With this thought in mind I would like to suggest that during a period of three months, commencing March 1, 1958, employers and unions, who are parties to illegal hiring arrangements, vigorously undertake to correct such arrangements by bringing them into compliance with the provisions of the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947 (the Taft-Hartley Law)," the Fenton letter proposes.

Browns-Olds Remedy

Those who don't conform to the law, warns Mr. Fenton, will be subjected to the "full application of the Brown-Olds reimbursement remedy."

The allusion is to the Brown-Olds case, little known outside labor circles—but much feared within. The case, decided by the N.L.R.B. a year ago, involved a local of the Plumbers Union and the J. S. Brown-E. F. Olds Plumbing & Heating Corp. of El Paso, Tex. The concern's contract required membership in the Plumbers Union before a worker could be hired.

It seems one Vernon L. Bryant had asked for a job with Brown-Olds, but when the company checked with the union his employment application was vetoed. The N.L.R.B. ruled that such a job denial was illegal, and the result of an illegal closed shop contract.

The union was ordered to pay Mr. Bryant the amount of money he would have earned had the job been granted—which up to that point had been the standard remedy in similar cases. But the board went further and created what has come to be known as the "Brown-Olds remedy."

"These (closed-shop) contracts are in themselves a continuing means of thwarting the policy of the act," the board declared. It ruled that all dues and assessments collected by the union from all its members as a result of the illegal contract would have to be refunded because they "constituted the price these employes paid in order to retain their jobs."

Later the board yielded to pleas from Plumbers Union officials that the Brown-Olds remedy would cost them hundreds of thousands of dollars, money which the union collected but no longer had. Sentence was commuted, but the Brown-Olds remedy has remained.

This remedy's stiff penalties face unions now, warns the N.L.R.B. counsel, if their hiring practices aren't brought into compliance with the law. And a board official notes that in the future the remedy will be applied to both the employer and the union. They are jointly responsible and will have to jointly refund back dues, he argues.

"The employers are worried about it," says an N.L.R.B. official. "So they'll tell the unions, 'Look, this could cost us money we never got in the first place and we've got to change' "

The unions are not likely to disagree, much as they dislike the Taft-Hartley law. The Brown-Olds doctrine could have a "savage effect" on unions, one labor lawyer says. He believes a test case will develop in the courts, but meanwhile labor will comply.

There's another side to the N.L.R.B. threat, too. Officials believe the force of the Brown-Olds remedy will be potent enough to make many building trades unions and employers agree to a settlement of N.L.R.B. cases involving illegal hiring practices without the lengthy hearing process. As part of the settlement, they will be required to consent to a court decree, setting forth the illegal practices they must halt.

"If they violate again, we can go right into court and get them cited for contempt," a board policy maker says. "This short-cuts the two-year process of going through the N.L.R.B."

As an example, he cites a case already decided by the board in a ruling backed by the courts. It involves Herald H. Blum, a 28-year-old heavy equipment operator from Oil City, Pa. Mr. Blum, a member of a Pittsburgh local of the Operating Engineers Union, went to Massena, N.Y., in March, 1956, to work on the St. Lawrence Seaway project.

Expecting to work there four or five years, Mr. Blum bought a trailer and took his wife and two children along, he says.

He then discovered a Syracuse, N.Y., local of his union was in charge and wouldn't recognize his card from another local.

"I had to pay them a 'dobie' of $2.50 every week," Mr. Blum recounts, "and keep up my $5-a-month dues to my own local too." The "dobie" he speaks of is jargon for the worker's payment for a union work permit. In return for it, the New York local allowed him on the job.

"But they booted me off to give the work to other men in their own local," Mr. Blum says. "They kicked me off of two or three jobs there."

Finally Mr. Blum complained to the N.L.R.B. The agency said that while no closed shop contract was involved, the companies and the union were engaged in illegal hiring practices. According to Mr. Blum, there were between 3,000 and 4,000 non-local Operating Engineers members working on the vast project, pouring some $10,000 a week into the union's coffers for work permits.

The N.L.R.B. leveled its Brown-Olds weapon, and the union, along with most of the companies involved, agreed to settle the cases quickly rather than pay back all that money. The board also got a court decree spelling out the forbidden acts.

An N.L.R.B. official says the cost of a work permit sometimes is a fixed sum. For example, a non-local workman might pay $300 for his permit, in weekly instalments of $25. "Then when it's all paid up," the official explains, "by some coincidence the job is gone and the man has to be fired. Next week the same job is filled by another new man who has $300."

Such illegal hiring practices, as well as the closed shop, are targets of the new N.L.R.B. policy.

WHY LABOR IS IN POLITICS

BACKGROUND

Conservative business groups are redoubling their efforts to convince everybody, including trade unionists themselves, that Samuel Gompers, founder and longtime president of the American Federation of Labor—which later, of course, merged with the Congress of Industrial Organizations—was opposed to labor participation in politics.

The latest example of this was a statement made by Sen. Barry Goldwater (R., Ariz.), who is trying to drive organized labor out of the political picture. Goldwater, at Senate Labor Committee hearings, remarked that workers might be persuaded to "get back to the suggestion of Samuel Gompers that they stay out of politics."

Just exactly what was it that Samuel Gompers suggested? In order that this question may be answered definitively and once and for all, Press Associates, the labor news agency, went to the files of the writings of Gompers as kept in the AFL-CIO library.

Among the documents there is a slim pamphlet published in 1920 and written by the late president of the AFL. It is called "Labor's Political Banner Unfurled."

"Stand faithfully by our friends and elect them. Oppose our enemies and defeat them; whether they be candidates for President, for Congress or other offices; whether Executive, Legislative or Judicial." The words "elect" and "defeat" are underlined, so that there can be no mistake about what Gompers meant.

Noting that the AFL convention of 1919 had "declared the necessity for concerted action by Labor for the election of candidates who are friendly to Labor and particularly the defeat of those who are enemies of Labor" and had directed the organization of Labor's National Non-Partisan Political Campaign Committee, Gompers wrote:

"The fight is on. In this fight, Labor will seek the election of fit candidates by a show of the records and of the facts." Declaring that Labor fought for the rights and freedoms of all men and not simply for those of union men, Gompers said that the interest of Labor in legislation was not limited merely to strictly labor matters but completed the circle "touching everything that has to do with human relations."

"Congress cannot do any single thing in which Labor is not interested," he declared. Gompers then cited a number of resolutions and statements made by organized labor dealing with labor participation in political action. One in particular said:

"It is the duty of trade unionists, their friends and sympathizers, and all lovers of freedom, justice and democratic ideals and institutions, to unite in defeating those seeking public office who are indifferent or hostile to the peoples' interests and the aspirations of labor."

Outlining many of the legislative demands of labor in the 1920 elections, Gompers then called on workers to stand by their friends and defeat their enemies at the polls, concluding:

"Men of labor, be up and doing! Bear in mind that vigilance is the price of liberty as much today as when the salient warning was coined. Men of labor, be up and doing at the primaries as well as in the elections. Now is the time that tries men's souls."

TODAY'S TEST

The congressional elections of 1958 will mark another test of strength for the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education (COPE) in the field of politics.

Before the battle gets too intense—and there is certainly every indication that it will be intense—it might perhaps be useful to examine again our fundamental premises.

Why is the trade union movement engaged in politics? What do trade unionists hope to achieve by their participation?

The aims and purposes and political commitment of political education and action by organized labor have been set forth clearly by James L. McDevitt, National Director of COPE. In an article in the AFL-CIO's Industrial Union Department's Digest recently, McDevitt wrote as follows:

I am convinced that too many of our members do not yet fully know the answers to these questions. I am equally convinced that when they do understand "why," many of our problems will be on their way to solution.

Today's world is an infinitely complex place.

We may yearn for the days when San Francisco was a long way from the east coast, when a flight from New York to Paris was an epoch-making event, when Amos and Andy ruled the air waves and people could only listen to, not see, the world's great events, when highways were uncluttered and a 250-mile auto trip was a big undertaking, when groceries were sold by a clerk and you talked to the butcher about the cut of meat you wanted, when local problems were local problems and when the editor of the Podunk Gazette could claim that "if it didn't happen in Podunk it didn't happen."

Realistically we know those days don't exist any more—and our memories cloud over the dark spots. Those, too, were the days of the 10 and 12-hour day, of small and weak labor organizations, of professional strikebreakers and Harry Bennett's "service" squads, of waves of unemployment, of bonus marchers, of cynical and corrupt political bosses ruling our local, state and sometimes national governments, and of domination of our national life by big business.

As the world has grown more complex the role of government has become more important and the responsibilities of the governed have grown.

As a simple illustration, in 1930 approximately 3.7 million individuals filed federal income tax returns. In 1953 over 57 million individual federal income tax returns were filed.

In 1930 there was no federal old age retirement program. Last month the Department of Health, Education and Welfare mailed out almost eight million checks to retirees under the Social Security Act. Next month they will mail out about the same number. Each month the Railroad Retirement Board mails out about 456,000 checks while the Veteran's Administration carries about 2.8 million people on its rolls as beneficiaries.

In 1930, when a man was thrown out of work—and many of them were in that year—his only means of feeding his family and keeping a roof over their heads were his own resources and handouts from charity. Today the average unemployment compensation payment is $29 a week—not enough, certainly, to maintain a decent standard of living but certainly better than the 1930 scale.

Governmental Role

Today we are concerned with the direction our economy is taking. Economists tell us it is going down at an unpleasantly rapid rate. They also tell us that were it not for various federal programs it would be going down at an even more rapid rate.

To the economists this is a matter of academic concern. To the building tradesman on the construction site or the factory worker in the plant it is a matter of bread and butter, clothes and shelter for himself and his family. It means the difference between meeting payments on his car on arguing with the repossessor, between meeting payments on the television set or watching it being toted out of the house.

What government policy is and what it will be in the next few months will hit each of us in the bread basket whether we like it or not. We may agree or disagree with the theory that government should or should not exercise control over economic policy, that it should be left to the businessmen. Whatever theory we hold, the inescapable fact of life today is that government does determine economic policy and thereby the amount of food in the family pot.

Nor is government some vague group of people called "they." It is composed of men and women elected to public office for specified periods of time by each citizen. It is either Adlai Stevenson or Dwight D. Eisenhower, Senator X or Senator Y, Representative A or Representative B, as we may choose at election time. We prosper or struggle depending upon their wisdom, foresight, prejudices, and capacity.

Sometimes I am told this is not so, that through our trade unions we can set rates and determine conditions that will affect the lives of our members and that is the limit of our responsibility as trade unionists.

It may be—although I doubt it—that there was a day when this was so but it is emphatically not so today. The trade union movement is composed of 16 million members in a sea of over 170 million people in the United States and more than two billion people in the world. We cannot live our lives apart from them, insulated and isolated in a world alone. To fulfill our responsibility as trade unionists we must recognize this fact.

More Than Economics

It is not only in the field of economic policy that government touches our lives. There is, as a matter of fact, scarcely a single human activity that is not influenced to some degree by government.

You get up in the morning, turn on the lights and turn on the radio. The rates you pay for electricity are set by a governmental commission. The station that broadcasts your morning program receives its license from a governmental commission.

Perhaps you have bacon and eggs for breakfast. Your bacon has been inspected by a governmental inspector and your eggs have, no doubt, been produced by chickens whose care and feeding has been suggested by research scientists of the Department of Agriculture.

You may take a street car or bus to work. The fares have been approved by a governmental commission. You read a newspaper in which, chances are, most of the stories are about the actions of the police department the night before or the fire department or the city council or your state and national government.

The place in which you work, most likely, has been licensed to operate. It has been inspected for certain safety conditions. Your employer has to keep certain records. He must deduct your income tax and your social security tax.

While you are at work your children are in school, being taught at the expense of the taxpayers. The shopping your wife does at the grocery store is protected by food and drug laws and you're pretty sure the weights and measures your grocer uses are honest.

At night you may catch a ride home with a neighbor. He is licensed to drive by a governmental agency and he obeys the traffic laws established by the city government.

Your television show in the evening is broadcast by a station licensed to do business and the very set itself must conform to certain safety standards to insure that it will not electrocute you as you turn it on or off.

At night you climb into bed. Your mattress has a tag on it that certifies its contents have been inspected. As you sleep, policemen are patrolling the streets and firemen are standing by in case you need them. The streets are being cleaned, trash is being collected, in accordance with the rules and regulations you, acting through your government, have established.

Perhaps this is a bleak picture. This is not the way we like to think of ourselves—protected, coddled, surrounded by rules and regulations. Yet we are not restricted or coddled, because these are rules and regulations we have imposed upon ourselves to insure the orderly operation of our society. Imagine, for instance, a city in which there were no traffic lights, no traffic regulations, no restrictions on drivers. It might work if everybody walked.

And I have only scratched the surface. Workmen's compensation laws, housing programs, fair labor standards, child labor laws, public assistance, education, agriculture, public health—all these and many others are activities of our government which we, as voters and as taxpayers, direct and control.

Why Politics

Granting that this is so, why, I am sometimes asked, is it necessary for our trade unions to engage in this activity? Why can't we engage in this activity in our individual capacities?

We can, of course, engage in the processes of government as individual voters but the curious thing is that the more involved people get in politics and government the more clearly they see the importance of acting together. Acting individually they can do something. Acting together they can do much more.

As Theodore Roosevelt once put it, "when a band of 150 or 200 honest, intelligent men, who mean business and know their business, is found in any district, whether in one of the local organizations or outside, you can guarantee that the local politicians of that district will begin to treat it with a combination of fear, hatred, and respect and that its influence will be felt."

Our trade unions are instruments we have devised for improving the welfare of our members. When so much of the welfare of our members is determined in the field of politics and government it is impossible for us, as trade unionists, to ignore it. Having recognized the necessity of action in this sphere it would be equally impossible for us to forget everything we know about organization and acting together when we enter the political arena.

There are those who say we should confine ourselves to legislative activities, that we should make our representations to members of Congress and members of the government and leave the rest to the members' own instincts.

Certainly our legislative activities are vital and the legislative department of the AFL-CIO does yeoman service on legislative matters in which the trade union movement is interested. Yet I feel sure it would be the first to say that politicians do not always act entirely on principle.

The politician knows, probably better than anyone else, who is a registered voter in his district and who is not. He knows where his support is coming from and where he may receive opposition. His judgment is guided, and properly so, by such factors, for his job is to satisfy and represent the people of his district. The only knowledge he has of their wishes is the knowledge he receives at the ballot box on election day and his ear is tuned to the pulling of the voting levers.

COPE seeks to help the member of Congress and the member of government know the wishes of his constituents and it seeks, likewise, to help the constituents know something about their representative.

Our Congress, unlike most parliamentary bodies in the world, provides for a daily printed verbatim record of its proceedings. It prints, except in cases in which the national security would be affected, the verbatim record of hearings before its committees. It records by name the vote of each individual Representative and Senator on roll calls, no matter how trivial.

Its intent, clearly, is that voters should know what Congress is doing.

The intent is admirable. Unfortunately the Congressional Record is a bulky document and the hearings before committees run to many pages. Decisive roll call votes, because of parliamentary procedure, are often hidden in technical quagmires.

To help constituents understand what is going on in Congress COPE undertakes so sift through the Congressional Record and the committee hearings, to interpret the significance of roll calls, and to analyze the meaning of governmental actions and decisions.

Having done this it then seeks to see to it that voters, particularly those in the trade union movement, receive this information and are prepared to act upon it in an effective way.

The only effective way of acting is obviously through politics and the only effective politics is organizaton. We come, therefore, to the organization of state and local COPE's, to registration drives, to drives for individual voluntary contributions with which to finance expenditures in connection with federal elections.

And even if all of what I have said here is unconvincing there still remains a compelling reason for our participation in politics. It is the fact that our opponents in the economic field are actively engaged in politics. They are actively seeking the passage of legislation that will benefit them when it comes to bargaining collectively and when it comes to the distribution of the products of our labor.

The record of Congress and of the state legislatures is full to overflowing with attempts to restrict the rights of our trade unions, with attempts to get the tax burden shifted to the shoulders of working people, with attempts to exploit natural resources for the benefit of a few, with attempts to narrow the scope of our social security and wage standards laws, with attempts to direct our government toward the interest of the few and against the many.

Labor's Political Commitment

The simple fact is that it was the Smith-Connally Act of 1943 and its successor, the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947, that compelled the present day labor movement to enter into politics. Were it not for those two pieces of punitive legislation it is possible that we would not today be exerting the efforts we are in the political field. Equally, if we were not today exerting the effort we are it is certain that Taft-Hartley and Smith-Connally would be weak tea compared to the brew that would be set before us.

The commitment to politics is one we cannot escape if we are to survive and if we are to serve our members. Having made it, as trade unionists we cannot escape the obligation to devote our utmost efforts to it.

We are making progress. Considering the length of time we have been active in this area I think we have made very good progress. But the challenge is always before us. The pressure is always on and the perils of failure are great.

In 1958 we will be engaged in another contest. I am sure that, given the help and support of our members, we will make a creditable showing. But it will take more than good intentions. It will require the active and interested support of each of us. No one can afford to sit on the sidelines.

Jack Johnson, the great Negro heavyweight, put his finger on it back in 1915 when he was fighting Jess Willard under Havana's blazing summer sun. A spectator at the ringside kept up a running fire of abuse. He criticized Johnson's style, made cracks about his color, complained about his ancestry and belittled his courage in the ring.

Finally, between rounds, Johnson leaned over the ropes, smiled down at the man and said: "Man, you're down there talking. I'm up here fighting."

In the effort in which we are engaged none of us can afford to be "down there talking." All of us, at least part of the time, have to be "up here fighting."

In 1962 he overcame obscurity, lack of financial backing (he's still paying a note on that campaign), immaturity, and the vote-diluting county unit system to defeat a well-entrenched segregationist who had one of the most obstructionist records on Capitol Hill.

In Washington Mr. Weltner has voted slightly left of center, disappointing the purist liberals occasionally on matters of economics and labor. He quickly mastered the intricacies of the bureaucracy and thereby has become so effective in obtaining appropriations for his district that he has won considerable admiration and support within the Atlanta power structure that once opposed him. He proposed and served as a member of the committee investigation of the Ku Klux Klan.

But by far the most interesting political fact about Representative Weltner is that he voted for the Civil Rights Act of 1964—and was handily re-elected later that year. His survival is strong documentation of the Southern political ferment to which he addresses himself in this volume.

Race lies at the center of any understanding of the South, and it is the core of Southerner. ". . . the burden of Southern history," Mr. Weltner writes, "is lost opportunity." He traces the failure of racial solutions from the arrival of slaves in Virginia—the same year the first representative government was established on the American continent—through the Constitutional Convention, Civil War, Reconstruction, Populist era, and the New Deal. Throughout, the Negro was "rarely regarded by either side as a fellow human being," but rather as an agricultural unit, a question for union or disunion, an easily obtained vote.

That is changing now, the congressman believes. The Supreme Court's 1954 school decision and subsequent civil rights efforts have humanized the problem and drawn attention to the moral issues involved. If the continued antics of Southern governors and midnight riders cast doubt on his optimism, election of men like Mr. Weltner help to give it validity.

He does not place all the blame on the South for its current anguish over race relations. Nevertheless, wherever the blame, the result is what Mr. Weltner calls "the Southern gap"—the serious lag behind the rest of the nation on almost any educational or economic index. "The South is poor because the Negro is poor."

Here the author pleads his political case with quiet eloquence. The federal government, he argues, is the most efficient tool for closing the gap, and the Democratic Party its best administrator. He finds it passing strange that Southerners should reject either.

He concedes, though, that the growth of the Republican Party is one of the most significant developments in Southern politics today. He expects the GOP to absorb the extreme racist elements from the Democrats, while what remains of the Democrats will move over to the national party. Thus there will be one Democratic Party, and the Republicans will be split into Southern and national wings.

The other major Southern political trend is the expansion of the Negro electorate. It will vote en bloc, Congressman Weltner predicts, only so long as it is threatened. Where the Negro vote is large, racism will be dampened.

The Southerner is direct, lucid, wryly humorous, and honest. Mr. Weltner does not gloss over the embarrassing. He concedes that his early public defense of racial justice was based on legalisms rather than the more important moral issues involved. He plainly sets forth the chronology of his change from nay to yea on the Civil Rights Bill; the switch occurred, as his critics delight to recall, when court-ordered redistricting shrank his base to a more liberal, more Negro constituency.

For those not familiar with the demise of Georgia's county unit system, its reapportionment, and the collapse of massive resistance, this book offers an added plus. But it is above all the document of a man who in turn is the symbol of an encouraging political revolution.

"There's a terrific sunset. Put on your

CONGRESSIONAL RULES

Background

Rules and procedures of Congress, including the seniority system, are stacked in favor of conservatives who want to block liberal programs supported by most Americans. In line with a recommendation by the American Political Science Association, a bipartisan group of Senators and Congressmen are proposing a Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress to make recommendations for basic reform of Congressional rules. But such reform will take time. Proposals for immediate reform center on the House Rules Committee and on the filibuster.

Rules Committee

For years a conservative coalition of Southern Democrats and Republicans has made the Rules Committee a graveyard for liberal legislation to advance civil rights, aid to education, health care, housing and other programs to help working people and their families. Early in 1961, Democratic leaders in the House, with Kennedy Administration support, won a narrow, 217-212, victory over this conservative coalition by increasing the size of the Rules Committee from 12 to 15 members. The Committee had consisted of four Republicans and eight Democrats, two of whom almost always joined with Republicans to kill liberal legislation. By adding two Democrats and one Republican, the leadership got a slight 8 to 7 edge on the Rules Committee, thus enabling the Kennedy Administration to get a substantial part of its legislation program up for action in the 87th Congress. But the Rules Committee enlargement was limited to the 87th Congress. It took another battle in the 88th Congress to maintain the 15-man committee.

However, this slight edge of 8 to 7 is not always enough to prevent the Rules Committee from blocking liberal legislation. Liberals favor re-establishing the 21-day rule which was in effect during the 81st Congress. This rule permitted committee chairmen to call up for House floor action, legislation which has been favorably reported by their legislative committees, after the Rules Committee has had 21 days in which to report the legislation and has not done so.

Cloture vs. Filibuster

In the Senate, the filibuster protection, Rule 22, still enables Southern Democrats - with tacit Republican support - to talk civil rights proposals to death. Cloture is the liberals' only weapon against such anti-civil rights filibusters, but so far it has not been effective on civil rights issues. As Rule 22 stands now, it take two-thirds of the Senators voting to invoke cloture and limit each Senator to one hour of debate. In recent years, Senate liberals have tried to cut the cloture-vote requirement from two-thirds to three-fifths of those voting. The civil rights resolution adopted by the AFL-CIO Fourth Consitutional Convention says:

> "We insistently urge earliest possible Senate action to change Rule 22 to make it possible for the Senate majority to prevail after reasonable time for debate."

DO'S AND DON'TS - COPE DOLLAR DRIVE

DO	plan your Dollar Drive carefully in advance.
DON'T	start collecting until you have appointed collectors in every work area, assembled all your literature and planned your publicity campaign.
DO	use posters and other means to publicize your COPE drive.
DON'T	just send off your collectors with a pep talk and then leave them to shift for themselves.
DO	train your collectors so they are prepared to answer all questions about COPE.
DON'T	embarrass your collector and lose contributions because he isn't quite sure how COPE money is used.
DO	establish a plan to make sure every worker (not just union members) is contacted. You won't get money without asking.
DON'T	burden one collector with so many people he gets discouraged before he even starts.
DO	appont one collector for each 10 or 20 workers.
DON'T	forget to ask business establishments with which you deal, friends and neighbors to contribute to COPE.
DO	use a catchy slogan, such as "Dollars for Democracy."
DON'T	be defensive. COPE collectors are not looking for a handout - they are doing their bit as good citizens to help elect good Congressmen so we can all enjoy better laws.
DO	approach people positively, appealing simply and directly to them as good citizens and good union members.
DON'T	give people an easy way out by asking them halfheartedly or by annoying them with high pressure sales tactics.
DO	assume that people will contribute if they are asked in a reasonable way.
DON'T	be satisfied with a "no" answer. Persist in explaining the importance of the drive.
DO	emphasize that you are asking the equivalent of only 2 cents per week.
DON'T	announce the end of the drive before your collectors and your publicity committee have had a chance to meet your quota.
DO	appeal to the members' pride in CWA as a union which assumes its rightful place in the political life of our nation.
DON'T	fail your local, your union, the labor movement, your nation and those deserving candidates who need help if they are to get elected.

HOW CONGRESS MAKES LAWS

1. A bill is introduced to Congress either by a Congressman or a Senator. This may be his own bill or he may have gotten the idea from some group or person back home or from some other group such as a labor union or business organization. Or, it may be the bill of the administration or the opposition.

2. Bills are referred to specialized committees which study them and make recommendations to the House or Senate. The committees are extremely important, as many bills are long and involved and generally the recommendation of the committee to the Senate or the House is accepted.

3. On most important bills, the committe which is studying the bill will hold hearings where representatives of various groups, or individuals who are interested, can present their views on the piece of legislation involved.

4. When the hearings are over, the committee and its staff studies all the recommendations and the bill itself and presents an agreed-upon bill to the House or the Senate for consideration.

5. The bill goes on the calendar in the Senate before it gets on the floor for debate. In the House of Representatives, it is sent to the Rules Committee which acts as a traffic cop and decides when the bill can be presented for debate.

6. When the bill passes one of the Houses of Congress, it is then sent to the other House for approval. If the bill passes the second House without any changes, it is sent to the President for his signature.

7. If the Senate and House pass different versions of a bill, the two separate bills are sent to a joint conference committee made up of Senators and Representatives. They compromise the issues involved and then the compromise bill is sent back to the House and Senate, where it is generally passed by both Houses.

8. If the President signs the bill, it becomes a law. If he vetoes it, it is sent back to the House and Senate. It takes a two-thirds vote to pass a bill over the President's veto.

HOW CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEES WORK

Committees are Workshops of Congress

Do you think you could analyze 10,625 bills in one year and make a sound decision on each of them?

This is the number of bills that were introduced in Congress in 1961. Each Senator and Representative, however, does not read and study every bill. Instead, Congress relies on the judgment of various committees. Committees greatly reduce the burden our Congressmen must bear.

Each committee is assigned a particular field of government. When a Congressman introduces a bill it is referred to the committee dealing with that subject.

Committees hold hearings and listen to witnesses who give reasons for or against bills. The committee then recommends that the bill be approved or disapproved. The committee can also show its disapproval of a bill by issuing no report. In most cases, Congress follows the recommendation of its committees when bills come to a floor vote.

There are four kinds of Congressional committees. The first is the Standing Committee. There are 15 Standing Committees in the Senate and 19 in the House. These are permanent committees. The problems they deal with, such as finance and foreign relations, are permanent in nature.

Special Committees are permanent committees made up of members of both the Senate and the House. An example is the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

Subcommittees are subdivisions of full committees. For instance, the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigation is a division of the Senate Committee on Government Operations.

The fourth committee is the Conference Committee, a temporary joint committee.

All members of Congress are assigned to at least one committee although each member of the Senate holds about eight committee assignments. The chairman and a majority of the members of each committee are appointed by the majority party. Since the Democrats now control the House and the Senate, all committee chairmen today are Democrats.

Committee chairmen are among the most powerful members of Congress. Why? A chairman can prevent a bill from being debated on the floor of Congress simply by refusing to bring the bill up for consideration in his committee. The Senate and House, by a majority vote, can bring the bill out of committee and up for debate, but this is rarely done.

IS POLITICS IMPORTANT TO US?

Every now and then you may run into people who think that it is not quite proper for organized labor to take part in politics.

This is the result of a never-ending campaign by conservative business interests who contend that unions should only concern themselves with strictly economic matters, such as collective bargaining, wages, hours, conditions of employment, etc.

Even if this were true, unions would still owe it to their members to engage in political education and political action. You know that your state legislature and Congress can affect collective bargaining, can fix minimum wages and maximum hours and can vitally influence working conditions. Indeed, they can even determine whether or not there shall be unions. After all, Congress did outlaw the Closed Shop and several state legislatures have prohibited Union Shop agreements.

There is not a single labor-management contract anywhere in America that is worth the paper it is written on if there is a Congress or state legislature that wants to weaken or destroy it. That is the main reason organized labor entered the political field and why it must remain active.

Unions have no choice but to be active in politics. Employers forced unions into political action. They decided that the place to curb the trade union movement, the place to do battle with the workers and their trade unions was in the legislative field. The Taft-Hartley Act, the Landrum-Griffin Act, the state "Right-to-Work" Acts are all the result of political action by employers. All these laws restrict the ability of labor to win gains at the collective bargaining table. Labor must be active in politics in order to prevent even worse legislation and, if possible, to remove some of the unfair provisions of present federal and state legislation.

But there is still another reason why trade unions should be in politics. Union members are also citizens and, as such, are interested in good schools, decent housing, a good transportation system, a fair deal for farmers and small businessmen, a tax system based upon the ability to pay, a healthy economy and hundreds of other laws that affect their well-being. Workers are interested in these matters, whether or not they belong to trade unions.

But for the most part, the average citizen is not represented in an organizational sense. Others, however, are organized for political action. Doctors, lawyers, dentists, and other business groups are organized politically in order to look out for their interests. But the interests of the average working man or woman are almost completely neglected, unless he belongs to a strong labor union which engages in effective political action. In short, the average person has a need for an effective mechanism through which he can translate his feelings on public issues into constructive down-to-earth action in Washington and his state capitol and city government.

For example, the average person is vitally concerned with the quality of the public schools his children attend. But public schools, by and large, are controlled by boards of education dominated by businessmen or local merchants whose primary interests is to keep taxes down and who might very well send their own children to private schools. These businessmen look upon the schools primarily as a place to teach a trade and useful work skills to youngsters, so that the employers themselves will not have to provide this training when the youngsters are ready to go to work. Very few of these members of boards of education are interested in giving the average child a truly liberal education - one that enables him to understand the social forces which determine how he lives or whether or not he is to survive at all.

Probably the most constructive single step that could be taken to improve our public schools would be effective political action to place on school boards candidates from the working class. Only these candidates can be really counted on to continually strive for the best possible school system for all of our children. But the individual worker, alone, can do very little in a matter of this kind. He needs organization and the one organization to which he belongs that could conceivably do the job for him is his union. If his union doesn't do the job, it probably will not get done.

The average community is also plagued with clogged highways, polluted air and water, slum housing and other undesirable conditions. Any and all of these problems can only be solved at the local level through effective political action by the union movement. This is the only agency which speaks for a sizeable fraction of the community and which is able to enforce its will at the polls.

"Politics ought to be the part-time profession of every citizen."

Dwight D. Eisenhower

LABOR'S HISTORIC INVOLVEMENT IN POLITICAL ACTION

Politics is a trade union tradition. As far back as 1828, the first city central body in the United States, the Mechanics' Union of Trade Associations of Philadelphia, supported candidates for city, county, and state offices on a workingmen's ticket. Under the same label, labor unions offered candidates in New York and Boston. Many of these candidates were elected to public office, including Ely Moore, President of the National Trades Union, who was elected to Congress from New York in 1834 and 1836.

The first nation-wide labor federation, the National Labor Union, strongly urged union participation in politics. In 1872, it nominated candidates for President and Vice President of the United States.

During the 1880's,when the Knights of Labor were at their peak, hundreds of candidates were supported by unionists. One-half dozen labor-backed candidates were elected to Congress, as well as to state legislatures and local offices.

In 1893, Samuel Gompers himself, then President of the American Federation of Labor, made an unsuccessful try for election to the New York State Constitutional Convention.

One of the nation's foremost authorities on labor, Edwin Witte, has pointed out that the AFL was organized primarily to secure the enactment of legislation favorable to labor. In its 1881 platform, the Federation urged that: "All trades and labor organizations secure representation on all law-making bodies by means of the ballot."

In 1893, the AFL submitted to its affiliated unions a political program. In 1896, Gompers was so deeply interested in the candidacy of William Jennings Bryan for President of the United States that at the next AFL convention it was falsely charged that Gompers had allowed his office to be used as a Bryan headquarters.

The Federation supported Bryan again in 1908, Woodrow Wilson in 1912 and 1916, James Cox in 1920 and Robert LaFollette in 1924 for President. In 1922, organized labor in Minnesota and Wisconsin joined with farm organizations in the farmer-labor political alliance.

In 1906, the AFL Executive Council drew up "labor's bill of grievances" to counter the abuse of unions by both Congress and the courts. That same year, the AFL issued an appeal to all affiliates for political action and issued a textbook on political issues and endorsed candidates. It conducted a fund-raising campaign to assist pro-labor candidates for office.

In the 1930's and 1940's, many local unions in the city central bodies supported Franklin D. Roosevelt in his four elections. In 1943, the Congress of Industrial Organizations formed its Political Action Committee, through which members of organized labor and the great mass production industries expressed themselves in the field of politics. PAC backed FDR in 1944,and in 1948, after the AFL convention voted to establish Labor's League for Political Education, both the PAC and LLPE supported Harry Truman for President.

Both the AFL and CIO endorsed Adlai Stevenson for President in 1952, and in 1956 the merged AFL and CIO endorsed Stevenson again. In 1960, the AFL-CIO endorsed John F. Kennedy.

In 1958, 25 candidates for the Senate who were endorsed by state COPE or state bodies in unmerged states were elected and seven were defeated for a winning percentage of 78. Of 294 House candidates supported by State and Congressional District COPE, 183 were elected and 111 defeated for a winning percentage of 62. State COPEs also endorsed 24 candidates for governor, of whom 18 won and 6 lost for a winning percentage of 75.

It is quite clear that labor has felt the need to be in politics for a long time. It is particularly important today, in our highly complex world, in a world dominated by bigness of organization where the individual has little power by himself, for organized labor to seek through combined action a better world for its membership. This is the only way in which the average person can have his voice heard in the national capitol or in state local capitols.

THE BUSINESSMAN IN POLITICS

Many workers look down upon politics as a rather disreputable type of activity, but their employers disagree with them. Employers understand that politics is important and they do everything possible to encourage management employees to become active in politics. Here are a few examples of how employers look upon political activity.

1. Quotation from Henry Ford II, President of the Ford Motor Company: "The stake we have in self-government is too great for any of us to assume the role of passive bystander. If we believe in a party and its nominee, then we whould support that party and that man to the limit of our ability.

   "The Republican and Democratic Parties need help in presenting their views to the public at large. They must have willing and interested workers who can devote time and effort to the job of encouraging millions of Americans to exercise their voting franchise. Both parties must raise money to cover the high cost of campaigning and radio, television, and various forms of advertising.

   "I urge all employees of Ford Motor Company to serve themselves and their nation in the next few months by devoting at least a portion of their available time to the interest of the party of their choice. I also urge you to contribute money to your party in whatever amount your means will permit. The actual size of your contribution is far less important than your willingness to make known where you stand politically."

2. The General Electric Company urges its employees to take part in both partisan and nonpartisan political activity. Nonpartisan political activity is defined as that type of activity designed to increase public understanding of significant social and economic problems. But General Electric also recommends partisan political activity: "There is, however, still an additional partisan political activity which responsible citizens should feel the need to carry on in connection with the party of their choice - even in the period between elections.

   "This need is for the responsible citizen - to the extent of his interest - to work within whichever is his party choice to help have the party's party's present officeholders act more constructively in the true public interest and to help the party offer better platforms and better candidates for the next election.

   "This includes devoting personal time and personal funds to the proper uses of the party of his choice whichever party that may be...

   "General Electric has neither the opportunity nor the desire to pressure any employee into political activity against his will or even beyond his natural or acquired interest. But the Company does encourage all its employees to participate in both the partisan and nonpartisan kind of political activity to the extent of their interest."

3. Some companies pay employees while they are taking part in partisan political activities. For example, Continental Oil Company allows time off with pay for "those employees who have been duly elected and are serving as officers at the precinct level and above in either of our two dominant political parties... for the purpose of conducting election-day activities incident to the party office he holds." Duly elected delegates to party political conventions also are given time off with pay for up to three days to attend these conventions.

4. Chase Manhattan Bank's policy states that if an employee is elected to a local or state legislature requiring his whole time away from the Bank, he will be paid full salary during his absence.

The Bank also has a public affairs department to encourage employee participation in politics and to keep bank personnel informed on issues and candidates.

5. Western Electric says: "It is the policy... to stimulate and encourage individual expression and action in the political life of the community."

6. Second Bank State Street Trust Company, Boston, tells its employees: "As a matter of policy, the Bank goes on record now as encouraging and urging its men and women - regardless of political affiliation - to seek enlightenment on the issues of the day and to work for enactment of measures and policies they personally believe to be wise and in the interest of good government."

7. Many companies, many trade associations, and local, state and national chambers of commerce have programs to promote political activities by individuals. These include activities such as: (a) sponsoring educational programs on practical politics; (b) handling registration and get-out-the-vote drives; (c) conducting campaigns to encourage contributions to political parties and to encourage employees to work actively in their party; (d) instituting programs of recognition for political achievements; (e) arranging political discussion meetings, visits with the candidates or plant visits by candidates; (f) encouraging management to help stimulate political activity by setting worthwhile examples.

8. In 1958, the Aeroget General Corporation conducted a drive among its employees at Azusa in Sacramento, California for contributions to political parties and their candidates. Some 11,000 of the 15,000 employees contributed an average of $2.00 each - with the larger amounts contributed by executives - bringing the total to $25,000.

9. The American Heritage Foundation, in cooperation with the Advertising Council, conducts a nation-wide "Give a Buck" campaign to promote broader public participation and political fund-raising.

10. The Toledo, Peoria & Western Railroad Company, in commenting upon the cost of political campaigns, tells its employees: "There is another obligation we have that has not been mentioned quite so much - that is to support the party or candidate of our choice with a financial contribution. It takes money to win a campaign for public office. TP and W notes that Abraham Lincoln's campaign for President 100 years ago cost about the same as a single national network broadcast in a modern political campaign. These costs can no longer be met by the candidates and a few heavy individual contributions. It is necessary for both parties to solicit campaign funds on a broad base." They further note that "your contribution as much as your vote will improve your party's chance of winning."

11. The Pacific Telephone and Telegraph Company and the Bell Telephone Company of Nevada devote space to employees who are active in politics. This series in the Pacific Telephone Magazine is called "People in Politics."

12. The Quaker Oats Company distributes to employees bibliographies of selected study and reading materials concerned with political responsibilities and current political topics.

13. The Gulf Oil Corporation has a program which includes instruction in public affairs, political procedures and the ways in which a citizen may take part in these. Records of members of Congress are analyzed.

14. The American Can Company has a program designed to: (a) identify major social, economic and political issues which will be considered by the Congress, analyze their implications, bring together the results of research on these issues, and provide management with the facts required to take sound positions. "Managers, thus, will be able to present their views intelligently to other employees of the Company, the members of the communities in which they work and live and to members of Congress;" (b) encourage managers to take an active interest in the process of selecting and electing legislators, help them to learn how to participate in this process through the party of their choice and stimulate them to encourage and assist others to do likewise; (c) present to all employees of the Company - through the medium of employee publications - newsletters and bulletins - facts which enable them to decide the kinds of legislative action which will increase their standards of living, strengthen the Company and improve the welfare of the nation. The American Can Company's program includes a study of voting records of federal elective officials.

15. Trade associations, including the American Farm Bureau Federation, the Manufacturers' Association of Syracuse, the National Retail Furniture Association, National Association of Real Estate Boards, National Association of Homebuilders, National Cottonseed Products Association, Inc., Steel Service Centre Institute, California Association of Life Underwriters, and California Association of Insurance Agents are among the scores of trade associations encouraging members to participate in politics on a local, state and national level.

THIRD HOUSE OF CONGRESS -- CONFERENCE COMMITTEES

Both Houses of Congress must approve all legislation in identical form before it goes to the President for signing into law. The House of Representatives and the Senate, however, usually pass different versions of major bills, since the second House to act on a bill can amend or rewrite any measure to fit its will. Differences between the two versions of a bill are ironed out in a Conference Committee of the two Houses.

Either House may request a Conference. The other House, being notified of this action, agrees to the Conference if it insists on its own version of the bill. Committee members are then appointed. The senior Senator of the majority party usually serves as chairman. The number of members chosen from each House may vary. Each House has one vote in Conference.

Under the rules, Conference Committees are expressly forbidden to (1) eliminate or make changes in that part of the legislation agreed to by both Houses; (2) include new material not approved by either House. However, a much used parliamentary device strengthens the power of Conferences by allowing them to write a new bill.

Procedure

All Conferences meet in closed session and no records are kept. Conference reports may be brought to the Senate floor at any time as privileged business, by a majority vote. In the House, members of the Conference Committee can be discharged if they do not report within twenty days after their appointment. Conference reports must be accepted, rejected, or recommitted in their entirety.

WHAT INFLUENCES CONGRESSMEN OR SENATORS?

Committee Reports. Thousands of bills are presented each session, many of them hundreds of pages long. Therefore, the Committee Reports are very important, because many Congressmen rely upon them.

Party Discipline is also important, since many Congressmen vote completely along party lines regardless of the merits of a particular piece of legislation.

Your Opinion. Postcards, letters and telegrams are very important. They let your Congressman or Senator know what people at home think about bills and remind them that the voters are watching. It is also important for delegations to call on Congressmen - in Washington or when they are back home - because this also influences their opinions.

HUAC AN OUTMODED INSTITUTION

A Congressman's look at the record of the House UnAmerican Activities Committee.

By Rep. Don Edwards

One wonders what the reaction would be if Britain were to adopt a "Committee on Un-British Activities." It would seem a most un-British thing to do, and certainly amusing.

Our own Committee on Un-American Activities also has its amusing aspects, and too many of us have brushed it aside as a curious eruption on the tough hide of our democracy—one that will go away in good time just as the Palmer Raids subsided eventually and Senator Joseph McCarthy of Wisconsin got his come-uppance when he took on the U.S. Army. It is easy to ignore the inherent danger to our constitutional liberties and sense of fair play as long as the targets are Communists, "radical" professors and students, and other disruptive members of our society. The fact is that the rights and liberties of all Americans are bound to the rights and liberties of each American, no matter how misguided or obnoxious his beliefs, associations, and preachments may be.

Although Congressmen enjoy a good joke occasionally, there are objections to the House Un-American Activities Committee which are so fundamental and constitutional that I believe it is the duty of Congress to set its own house in order and not wait for the Supreme Court to save us from our follies.

HUAC was created as a standing committee by a very close vote in 1945. At that time, Majority Leader John McCormack said: "If this amend-

RESOLVED, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, two thirds of both Houses concurring, that the following articles be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as amendments to the Constitution of the United States, all or any of which articles, when ratified by three fourths of the said Legislatures, to be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the said Constitution, viz.

ARTICLES in addition to, and amendment of the Constitution of the United States of America, proposed by the Congress, and ratified by the Legislatures of the several States, pursuant to the fifth article of the original Constitution.

Article the first. After the first enumeration required by the first article of the Constitution, there shall be one Representative for every thirty thousand, until the number shall amount to one hundred, after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress, that there shall be not less than one hundred Representatives, nor less than one Representative for every forty thousand persons, until the number of Representatives shall amount to two hundred, after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress, that there shall be not less than two hundred Representatives, nor more than one Representative for every fifty thousand persons.

Article the second. No law, varying the compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives, shall take effect, until an election of Representatives shall have intervened.

Article the third. Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Article the fourth. A well regulated militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms, shall not be infringed.

Article the fifth. No soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

Article the sixth. The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Article the seventh. Excess bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

Article the eighth. In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; he shall not be compelled to give evidence against himself; he shall enjoy the assistance of counsel for his defence.

Article the ninth. In suits at common law, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of common law.

Article the tenth. Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

Article the eleventh. The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

Article the twelfth. The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

ment is adopted, as far as I know, it will be the first time in history of this body that a committee of this kind was ever established as a permanent or standing committee." Since then there has never been a serious threat to the existence of the committee from the House of Representatives itself.

HUAC's legislative score, during its 20 years of life, is considerably less impressive. To date, not a single conviction under the legislation it formulated has been upheld in the Supreme Court.

The Committee spends over $300,000 a year running "show-off" hearings and keeping up voluminous files of unverified information. These files have been used, according to The New York Times, by anti-Negro agencies in Alabama. The director of the House Un-American Activities Committee, Francis J. McNamara, has stated that the staff replied to 3,800 requests for information from Congressmen in 1962 alone. On July 29, 1963, the Congressional Record contained 30 pages of material inserted by a Member of Congress from the committee's files. The material purported to prove that the NAACP was subversive. It suggests that the NAACP is infiltrated with Communists. Among the NAACP leaders whose reputations for loyalty to this country were besmirched are such distinguished Americans as A. Philip Randolph, Dr. Robert C. Weaver, Dr. Ralph Bunche, Solicitor-General Thurgood Marshall and Clarence M. Mitchell.

HUAC's basic mandate from the Congress is to investigate "subversive and un-American propaganda," in itself an infringement on the First Amendment. But what it actually does, besides building files from dubious sources, is to investigate people, not propaganda, for the purpose of exposing them to the general public and the press, as subversive. The press is often informed in advance who has been subpoenaed, a violation of committee rules. At HUAC hearings, the ordinary protections one has in a court of law are all but absent.

Punishment of an American citizen by bringing him before a Congressional committee "for the purpose of exposure" is a legislative trial and is unconstitutional, under Section 9 of Article I, which prohibits bills of attainder. A bill of attainder is, in effect, a judgment of guilt and punishment by a legislative body rather than in a court of law.

Yet we permit HUAC to punish citizen after citizen for prior actions, opinions and associations which are not crimes, but which the committee considers distasteful. Witnesses are called and subjected to publicity and exposure, in effect convicted by a legislative committee of associations or ideas which are not crimes but which the committee feels are punishable regardless. Loss of reputation and job follow as news of the legislative trial is spread on the front pages of the newspapers.

I do not want to leave the impression that it is hopeless to expect the House of Representatives to act regarding the committee, or that we must wait for the Supreme Court to proceed case by case to correct the abuses of this arm of the Congress. More and more, our highly respected newspapers, church organizations, and other groups are calling upon the Congress to put an end to HUAC.

I suspect, too, that the excesses of the Radical Right in vilification of such people as Chief Justice Earl Warren and Dwight Eisenhower have awakened to their responsibilities as citizens those who had been silent so long as the super-patriots were denouncing egg-heads and liberals as un-American and willing tools of the Kremlin.

Unfortunately, some critics of the committee took comfort in the announcement that HUAC would investigate the Ku Klux Klan. They may hope that HUAC will now go after the Radical Right with the vigor it has heretofore reserved for causes on the left. It is ironic that if there is one institution that is peculiarly "American," it is the Klan. We can't blame the Klan on the Soviet Union.

The point is that acts by Klansmen—or Communists, or anyone else—which threaten the rights and lives of other American citizens, should be punished. But their right to speak openly their misguided, and in some instances loathsome views, cannot be restricted without imperiling the liberties of us all. Investigation by the House Un-American Activities Committee, or any other committee, of the KKK is not what is needed. What is needed is the enforcement of the law against members of the Klan or any other group who deprive people of their civil rights by threats, intimidation, bombing, and murder. New federal laws are needed to protect the civil rights guaranteed in the Act of 1964 and in the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Rep. Don Edwards (D, Calif.)

The proper committee to draft this legislation is the Committee on the Judiciary where both of these historical acts were drafted. That committee, composed of 35 lawyers, has never gone about the country garnering headlines by "sensational exposés" of people the FBI knew about all the time.

I am convinced that a substantial majority in the House of Representatives is opposed to the existence of the House Un-American Activities Committee and would welcome the transfer to the Committee on the Judiciary of all matters affecting the internal security of our country.

What the House of Representatives needs in order to act is a more vocal support from those back home. We owe it to ourselves and to our heritage to do better by the First Amendment.

The 89th Congress made important gains in changing rules which allowed a handful of powerful men to bottle up needed legislation year after year. I hope that the 90th Congress on opening day will remove another outmoded institution which demeans and belittles the Congress, by abolishing HUAC.

Don Edwards is the Democratic Representative from the Ninth District of California. He is national chairman of Americans for Democratic Action.

AFL-CIO Sees Attack on Johnson Policies Spurring a Conciliatory White House Mood

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

MIAMI BEACH — AFL-CIO officials are beginning to think that their week of sharp attacks on a series of Administration economic policies is producing the desired results.

This thinking could be somewhat wishful, tempered by the distance from Washington, the Florida sun and the venting of the union officials' earlier sharp anger at the Administration. But they read remarks over the weekend by President Johnson and Secretary of Labor Wirtz as somewhat conciliatory. Federation chiefs think the White House doors will be open somewhat wider to them when they return to Washington so they can discuss their points of irritation with the President.

These points are chiefly the Administration's reported position on an increase in the Federal minimum wage, its wage guideposts, and what union officials consider too great a preoccupation by the Administration with the threat of inflation.

The main purpose of attacks by AFL-CIO President George Meany and the federation's Executive Council over the past week on these matters has been to convince Mr. Johnson that the union officials are in a high state of unhappiness and that it is necessary for the President to sit down with them and talk out their troubles.

As they read the remarks by Mr. Johnson in his news conference Saturday and by Mr. Wirtz in a television appearance Sunday, chances are improved for down-to-earth discussions leading to some decision, particularly on the minimum wage. It wasn't so much what the President and Mr. Wirtz specifically said but the general tone of their remarks that lead to this belief. The President's comments were viewed as seeking to avoid any open troubles with the labor movement, and Mr. Wirtz' remarks were looked on as far softer than his private comments to union chiefs last Monday.

It isn't certain yet when the discussions with the President will take place on what increase the Administration will support in the Federal minimum wage. But the feeling here is that they could come sometime this week.

The federation has been demanding an increase in the current $1.25-an-hour minimum to $1.40 this year and to $1.60 in 1967. There have been reports that a recommendation before the President calls for delaying the increase to $1.60 to 1968 or later. It's evident that some compromise may be forthcoming, but the union chiefs want to work it out in direct consultation with Mr. Johnson and the Democratic leadership in Congress. Until now, they feel they have been left out of what they consider a matter extremely vital to their interests.

In public statements over the weekend, the AFL-CIO council again attacked the Johnson Administration's 3.2% wage guideposts—aimed at keeping pay raises in line with increases in productivity—but this was expected. The council's statement attacking the Administration for paying too much attention to the dangers of inflation and not enough to further reducing unemployment was also to be expected.

Mr. Johnson, in his weekend news conference, didn't give any indication he was about to retreat from either of these positions. Indeed, the disagreements on these points between the Administration and the federation could lead to future troubles. But AFL-CIO officials are more impressed at this point with the fact that Mr. Johnson carefully avoided any hostile remarks about the attacks made on his policies by the AFL-CIO council meeting last week.

AFL-CIO Leaders Seem to Have Averted A Threatened Major Break With Johnson

By JOHN A. GRIMES
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

MIAMI BEACH—Despite noises that seem to run to the contrary, AFL-CIO leaders suddenly appear to have averted what threatened to be a major and open break with President Johnson.

The danger of a break, federation officials concede, was very real. It stemmed from the anger and frustration of union men at the defeat of their efforts to win repeal of state "right to work" laws, their inability so far to win Presidential approval for Congressional passage of a Federal minimum-wage law they regard as acceptable, what they read as rising Administration emphasis on union wage gains as a threat to economic stability, and a host of other irritations.

But after three days of Executive Council meetings, federation leaders think they are bringing this disorganized anger under control and directing it away from ground where a break with the President is threatened. "The significant thing that's happening is that people are treading very carefully in this territory," says one union official. Adds another: "This was thin ice, and they walked across it."

Other union officials note that even though AFL-CIO President George Meany at a press conference Tuesday directed what was obviously a warning to the Democratic Party that labor might not be a taken-for-granted ally in the fall elections, he was careful to keep the outburst from involving the President. Mr. Meany declared that the federation would be "more choosy" about the Congressional candidates it backs this fall if its views on such key legislative items as minimum wage and revising the unemployment-compensation system are ignored by the Administration and the Democratic Congress It's understood that the federation's high command talked of the possibility early in the week of withholding money from the Democratic National Committee, allocating political funds directly to particular candidates.

"We can make our own way without the Democratic or Republican Party," Mr. Meany declared. "I don't buy the idea that we have to toady along behind any particular party. I don't buy the idea that we have no place to go."

COPE to Intensify Efforts

Yesterday, however, the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education (COPE) voted to intensify its efforts to collect funds to help reelect liberal Congressional candidates—most of them Democrats—and to register more voters and turn them out at the polls. The success of both of these programs will mostly benefit the Democrats—and along with it the Johnson Administration.

Federation men know this well. But they also know that if they fail to give all the help they can to the reelection of the House and Senate liberals this fall, they will lessen their influence at the White House and in Congress.

Yet they are trying to establish some independence of political action with an eye to making the Johnson Administration and the Congressional Democratic leadership listen to the federation's views more carefully on matters that most directly affect the unions' interests. Indeed, there was a heavier emphasis than in previous years on the independence of the federation's planned political efforts this fall.

"The trouble with the tack being taken by some of these guys in criticizing Johnson directly is that they would have made the President an enemy, and you can't do that," says one AFL-CIO aide.

At the opening of the federation's executive council meeting here Monday, the AFL-CIO and President Johnson seemed to be headed for a direct clash. The week earlier had brought sharp and pointed criticism of Mr. Johnson from some union officials; resentment was expressed at what union officials considered Mr. Johnson's lack of support for repeal of the "right to work" laws. Federation men also were heavily critical of recommendations currently before Mr. Johnson that he support a Federal minimum wage well below what the AFL-CIO considers reasonable, and there was some support for cutting out any union contribution of political funds to the Democratic National Committee.

The dominant sentiment was enough to cause Labor Secretary Wirtz, who came here for a round of meetings with the union chiefs, to openly express alarm. He said he was "concerned" at the "apparent development of antagonisms" between the Administration and the federation. What worried Mr. Wirtz was the possibility that developing strains between the unions and the Johnson Administration and the Democratic leadership in Congress could endanger the passage of legislation that is a key part of Mr. Johnson's domestic program, including the higher Federal minimum wage and reform of the Federal-state unemployment-compensation system.

Mr. Wirtz, in his Monday meeting with the federation's Executive Council, in effect warned the members that by trying to publicly prod the President into a particular course of action they might run the risk of getting him angry at them, a suggestion not only rejected by most council members but in some cases resented.

The subject on which the federation currently is trying to prod the President is the Federal minimum wage. Union officials hear reports that Mr. Johnson's Council of Economic Advisers is recommending he support increasing the current $1.25-an-hour floor to $1.40 an hour this year and to $1.60 by 1970. AFL-CIO officials, though they have taken the position that the minimum should be raised to $2 an hour, are demanding an increase to $1.40 an hour this year, $1.60 in 1967 and $1.75 in 1968. Mr. Johnson has recommended to Congress that the level be raised but hasn't specified a figure.

Union Concern for a Victory

The federation would probably go along with an increase to $1.60 an hour in 1967 without the automatic increase to $1.75 an hour in 1968—but with the understanding that the lower level was only a "down payment" on future legislation raising the rate.

The argument over what the Administration finally recommends might seem to be narrow, but the concern about it runs deep. What the federation is seeking is to convince Mr. Johnson, by public pressures if necessary, that the federation must have a victory out of this session of Congress—and the minimum-wage increase is a key to this. If the union leaders can't show a victory to their members, AFL-CIO officials fear they won't be able to arouse the rank and file to the enthusiasm needed to turn out large numbers at the polls.

Burns Claims Union Support For Re-Election

TALLAHASSEE (AP) — Gov. Haydon Burns yesterday claimed his bid for re-election has the backing of the state AFL-CIO, the Communication Workers of America, and the Florida Federation of State, County and Municipal Employes.

He said an AFL-CIO state convention in Orlando last week voted to support him over Miami Mayor Robert King High and former state Sen. Scott Kelly of Lakeland. Burns said he received 249 votes, High 134 and Kelly 41 in a ballot of convention delegates. 3-8-66

He said he was "most gratified" to receive the support.

Labor and the Democrats

Here is a digest of a recent address by IAM President Roy Siemiller to the New School for Social Research, New York City.

By Roy Siemiller

The scope and breadth of trade unionism today extends far beyond collective bargaining and the processing of grievances.

When I was a youngster going into my first job the goal of unionism was simply to get enough to eat, to reduce hours and to protect the members from the more obvious abuses of arbitrary management decisions. Most of our early goals have long since been achieved.

Today we are concerned with larger goals. We are concerned with the total social and economic progress of the nation as a whole.

We know we have a responsibility not only to our own members but to those who are unorganized. Our concern extends not only to the aged but, yes, even to those who are still unborn.

This means, of course, that unions today are more than an economic institution.

For many years, in fact for generations, the American Labor Movement operated on what we call "bread and butter" principles.

We were primarily concerned with the problems of the work place. But we know today that the problems of the work place, the problems of workers, are affected for better or for worse by decisions that are made in 50 state capitals and most of all in Washington, D. C.

This means that union members must be concerned and must be active in the political life of the nation at all levels.

As you know, the labor movement in America, unlike those in many other countries, has not developed its own political party.

Beginning with Samuel Gompers' famous dictum that "Labor must reward its friends and punish its enemies," we have tried to secure our objectives within the framework of existing parties.

This has brought us into a position where most often —not always, but most often—we find ourselves supporting candidates of the Democratic party.

In the most recent election in 1964, the labor movement donated money and pounded the doors of the voters to get out a Democratic vote.

We did this because we had a commitment from the candidates and in the official platform of the Democratic Party that they would repeal Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Right-to-work issue

Just let me say briefly that the right-to-work laws which this section authorizes have accomplished the fond hopes of those who inserted it in the Taft-Hartley Act.

Right-to-work laws have retarded the growth and weakened the strength of unions in those areas of the country where wages are lowest and where unions are the most needed.

14(b) has hurt the people, the working people, in vast areas of the country. Right-to-work laws have undermined the working conditions of the work force, not only in the states where these laws have been enacted, but in all states.

They have done this be creating unfair wage competition between states.

I am convinced that the Democratic party did not live up to its commitment to the labor movement or its own platform.

The President of the United States wears two hats: the one as the representative of all the people and the other as leader of his party, in this case the Democratic party. His is the responsibility for how the party performs.

The repeal of 14(b) was defeated, not by a vote of the Senate, but by a filibuster.

A lot of people blame Mike Mansfield for failure to break the filibuster. I don't blame Mike Mansfield. I blame the Democratic party. It was the Democratic caucus that elected him majority leader.

He is a creature of the party. If the party had wanted to break this filibuster they could do so in the same way they have broken filibusters in the past. Round-the-clock sessions, for example, would have broken the filibuster in less time than the debate on whether the bill was to be taken up for discussion.

Of course you might say that I'm blaming the wrong people and the wrong political party. You might say that the leader of the filibuster, Everett McKinley Dirksen, the junior Senator from my home state of Illinois, had something to do with it.

Having tasted this victory, he is now boasting that he will use the same tactics to defeat labor's other primary objectives in this Congress.

He tells us that he intends to lead similar filibusters to defeat a long overdue overhaul of the unemployment insurance system, as well as any meaningful amendment of the minimum wage law.

But how did Everett McKinley Dirksen get all this power? I am convined that he, too, is a creature of the Democratic party.

I am convinced that had the late President Kennedy not called Everett Dirksen to Washington in the midst of the Cuban missile crisis, the junior Senator from Illinois today would be U. S. Congressman Sidney Yates.

Sidney Yates ran a good race. He was a progressive and outstanding candidate. But when President Kennedy called Senator Dirksen to Washington it gave him an opportunity to go back to Illinois and inform the voters that the President needed him.

I am also convinced that somewhere along the line orders went out to cut Sidney Yates' vote on the west side of Chicago.

Had he received the vote that Democratic candidates normally receive in the west side wards, he, and not Everett McKinley Dirksen, would be the junior Senator from Illinois. This is why I insist that the Senate Minority Leader is a creature of the Democratic party.

Unfair guide lines

As you can see, I'm pretty bothered, and perhaps even cynical, about what's happening in Washington today. I'm concerned not only by what is happening to wage-earners on the legislative front, but on the economic front as well.

Like most union officers and an increasing number of union members, I am concerned that while the profits of management are sky-rocketing out of sight, the major emphasis of the President's Council of Economic Advisers is to hold down wages.

If the so-called economic guide lines were fairly set and fairly administered, we in the labor movement would be willing to take another look at them.

But these guide lines have a number of built-in inequities which are costing workers their fair share of the fruits of their rising productivity.

In the first place the Council of Economic Advisers has set a very definite and stated ceiling of 3.2 per cent on wage increases.

This is supposed to correspond to the annual rise in productivity. But there is no definite and stated ceiling on prices. This is because productivity varies so widely from industry to industry. In most industries, nobody really knows what it is.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics prepares productivity figures for only a relatively few industries, and many of these are unimportant.

The second inequity grows out of the nature of collective bargaining itself. When a union intends to bargain for a new contract it must give industry 60 to 90 days notice.

This gives the Government ample time to exert all kinds of pressure on the union to hold its wage proposals within the so-called guide lines.

But when an industry wants to raise prices, it doesn't have to notify anyone. It just raises prices and the Government is presented with an accomplished fact.

Economic danger

And it's harder for the Government to move in after prices have been increased than before wages are raised. This inequity is so apparent that Congressman Celler has proposed a bill which would require industry to give 60-day notice of price increases. But I haven't seen the Council of Economic Advisers rushing to get on the bandwagon for this proposal.

Third, though the Council says that productivity is rising at an annual rate of 3.2 per cent, it arbitrarily changed the rules in mid-stream in order to maintain that figure. Where it had previously used a 5-year moving average, which means that this year it should have dropped 1960 and added 1965, thus getting a 3.6 per cent increase in productivity, it suddenly switched to a different method of computing its figures.

The result is unions are still stuck with the 3.2 per cent rate.

Actually during the past 5-year period, real wages have not even come up 3.2 per cent per year. They've increased only 3 per cent annually.

Since the workers have been short-changed we must ask who's getting the benefit of our increasing productivity. The answer isn't hard to find.

From the first quarter of 1961 to the fourth quarter of 1965, corporate profits increased by an average of 14.3 per cent after taxes each year. This is a fantastic rate of increase. And I think it spells danger for our economy.

We say we have a capitalist system but more truthfully we should call it a consumer economy. Our system is based on the ability of people to purchase the product of their labor. Our economy cannot remain healthy if productivity and profits continue to out-run wages and purchasing power.

It is the responsibility of the labor movement to see that they do not. When I say that union members are concerned about the inequities of the giude lines, I mean just that. This is not an artificial issue being whipped up by the leadership. The grass roots are really stirring.

Just before I was getting ready to come here, I received a copy of a very interesting and informative telegram which an IAM Lodge in New York sent to President Johnson, Willard Wirtz, Jacob Javits and Robert Kennedy. Here is what it says:

> "Airline Lodge 1894 has, by unanimous acclamation, on February 23, 1966 at its regular meeting, instructed the Executive Board of this Local, to inform you, that it rejects in total, the concept of the 3.2 per cent Presidential wage increase guide lines.
> "It has no intention of conforming with it.
> "It further demands that its international exceed 3.2 per cent in its current negotiations until such time that a similar 3.2 per cent guide line is imposed on professional services, executive salaries, and corporate profits.
> "To do so, 3.2 per cent must be widely exceeded.
> "We will have no part in undermining the prosperity of the majority of America's people, its workers."

This telegram tells you much more effectively than I can how the rank and file feels about these unfair and one-sided guide lines.

Go-Go Union

Despite the political and economic roadblocks that face us and despite those who are always ready to dance on labor's grave, the labor movement has never been healthier. And this is particularly true, I am happy to say, of the Machinists Union.

Ours is the most diversified and complex union on the North American continent and possibly in the world. Our membership is employed in every kind of job in every industry.

We represent auto mechanics and cab drivers, airline employees and railroad craftsmen, factory workers and electronic engineers, apprentices and journeymen, floor sweepers and tool and die makers, government employees and missile technicians.

You name the job and chances are that we represent it somewhere in the United States and Canada.

Our representatives must know more about more industries and more laws than those of any other union.

And yet, I believe that our diversity gives us more strength and flexibility than any other union.

We know how to represent many kinds of workers and, as the ad slogan goes, "We must be doing something right."

For the past year, we have been increasing our membership at an average rate of 5,000 new members a month.

We are organizing the unorganized. We are organizing the younger workers.

I say this with some pride because there are those who claim that unions no longer have the "public image" that will attract youngsters who don't remember how things were before unions made them better.

We face the future with confidence. We believe that with the stronger financial base our members gave us a little over a month ago, we can do even more to serve the members we have and to organize those who need us.

So long as I am president, the basic goals of the IAM will be to organize aggressively, to bargain effectively, and to serve our members as well as we can in the work place and in the community.

Meany Says Democrats Need AFL-CIO More Than It Needs Them

Labor Politics

Wirtz, in Prior Speech, Seems Conciliatory on Construction Unions' Dislike of Guidelines

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON — AFL-CIO President George Meany, in his strongest declaration of independence from the Democratic Party yet, declared that the Democrats need labor more than labor needs the party.

Mr. Meany's remarks were made in an off-the-cuff speech before the annual legislative conference of the AFL-CIO Building and Construction Trades Department.

Earlier, Labor Secretary Wirtz gave another indication that the Administration has decided to avoid public battling with the unions over the President's anti-inflationary wage guideposts. In a speech to the craft union conference, Mr. Wirtz praised the unions' record in backing programs that are in the public interest, but he didn't once mention the word "guideposts." Instead, he spoke guardedly about the necessity of maintaining wage and price "stability" in the construction industry.

Mr. Meany's speech underlined the continuing discontent among union leaders at the failure of the Democratic leadership in Congress to help push through labor-backed measures.

But Mr. Meany was careful to aim his fire at the Democratic Party, and not directly at President Johnson—even though some union chieftains still grumble privately that defeat of a bill to repeal state "right-to-work" laws, which outlaw the union shop, was due to tepid support from Mr. Johnson.

Mr. Meany declared that "I don't buy the idea . . . that labor needs the Democratic Party. I'm sure it is the other way around." He added that labor couldn't buy "either party." The Democrats, he said, "cannot deliver" on legislation and the Republican Party seems to be under the control of "financial interests."

"So I would say," Mr. Meany said, "that we have got to take a new look at our political action." This means, he added, that unions must work through the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education and that "we don't work with any political party, whether it is Republican, Democrat or anything else."

In practical terms, the Federation's adherence to this position in the fall Congressional elections would mean that union money and manpower would be ladled out only to those candidates judged most likely to support union views on legislation. This wouldn't help many Republicans, but it will mean that AFL-CIO unions won't "go along" as easily as in the past with the local Democratic organization candidate, particularly in the South.

For the most part, however, the aims of the Democratic Party and the AFL-CIO in trying to reelect the heavy "liberal" Democratic majority in Congress will coincide. The federation has made the reelection of some 50 freshmen Democratic lawmakers a top priority project.

Democratic Candidates Are Angry

By ROWLAND EVANS and ROBERT NOVAK

Washington.

ANGRY Democrats worried about the 1966 campaign have given up on the Democratic National Committee and are quietly planning an elite, behind-the-scenes directorate to handle the crucial congressional election.

Although the idea is still in the talk stage, it reflects the total disillusionment, tinged with growing anger, over the committee's haplessness.

Scarcely a cent of the $600,000 raised in last summer's big congressional campaign dinner has yet found its way into the Democratic campaign fund of the House.

In fact, as of six weeks ago, the national committee had not paid all the bills that resulted from that dinner.

That's only the start. The committee's much ballyhooed services to freshman Democrats are being savagely reduced.

WORRISOME

Last year the committee made available to Democrats in Congress three telephone lines, over which political messages to the voters back home could be recorded instantly.

Members used the device to declaim against sin, promote the Great Society, and advertise themselves.

Now, however, two of the lines are down to save money. The third is often not available for the simple reason that the White House can preempt it at will.

As a result, members with something timely to say find that their recorded statements, which the committee is supposed to deliver to hometown radio stations, often can't be recorded until it's too late.

Far more worrisome to the professionals is the national committee's failure to get moving on the 1966 campaign.

One by one, vital divisions of the committee, such as the division to register new voters, have been drained of operating funds and manpower.

One prominent Eastern seaboard Democrat in the House describes the present condition of the national committee as "absolutely disgusting." It is a widely held view.

That's why serious consideration is now being given to setting up an informal but high-powered directorate of perhaps half-a-dozen political experts to guide the congressional campaign.

One obvious candidate for a key role in this inner directorate: Al Barkin, savvy head of organized labor's Committee on Political Education, known as COPE.

Barkin is outraged by what is not going on at the national committee. He has pleaded, begged, and cajoled the White House, and now is quietly warning that any more delay by the national committee in gearing up for the campaign could have an exorbitant cost in Democratic seats next November.

National Committee Chairman John W. Bailey, who also doubles as Connecticut state chairman, has little power today.

NEOPHYTE

The President's man there is not Bailey but its executive director, courtly, amiable Clifton Carter, an old political lieutenant of Mr. Johnson's from Texas.

However, Carter himself is now wholly occupied with fund-raising to pay off the debt. Besides, Carter takes orders from W. Marvin Watson Jr., the White House appointments secretary and confidential presidential assistant. But Texan Watson is an unknowledgeable neophyte in national Democratic politics.

Professional Democratic politicians from the North give both Watson and Carter A for effort in at least trying to reduce the committee's $3 million - plus deficit. But the campaign, the professionals fear, is simply beyond the capability of the Watson-Carter duo.

That's why they are turning to Barkin and O'Brien, whom they view as dependable havens in a storm.—(c1966.)

It's Elliott all the way with Alabama labor

Former Congressman Carl Elliott has won the overwhelming endorsement of the Alabama Labor Council for Governor in the May 3 Democratic primary. The vote was 407 to 18.

A 70-man IAM delegation led by State Council of Machinists officers T. E. Helton and Charlie J. Wilson went on record unanimously for Elliott, Don Ellinger, national coordinator for the Machinists Non-Partisan Political League, reports.

During his 16 years in Congress, Elliott repeatedly proved his fair-mindedness to labor as a member of the House Education and Labor Committee and the House Rules Committee. In accepting Alabama labor's endorsement, Elliott told the delegates:

"The Elliott Administration will not 'bribe' potential industry with promises of cheap labor. Instead we are going to lay it on the line, and we are going to sell industry on the advantages of setting up shop in a state where people take pride in their work, give an honest day's work for an honest day's pay, and are as highly skilled, as highly trained and industrious as any people on earth."

Alabama labor also endorsed four Congressional candidates: Judge Richard E. McPherson, 1st District; Franklin H. James, 2nd District; Ed Pepper, 4th District; and Gary Burns, 7th District. Guy Sparks was endorsed for State Attorney General.

Labor — Politics

LABOR takes a 'NEW LOOK' at POLITICAL ACTION

'You can't buy either party,' says George Meany. 'This means that we work with COPE and support people rather than labels . . .

By George Meany
President, AFL-CIO

THERE is a vicious propaganda campaign going on, spearheaded by the employer organizations. This campaign is directed against the American trade union movement. The public is being told, from editorial pages, from slanted news, from articles in our slick paper magazines, that American labor is too powerful, that it has too much political power, that it is a bad influence on the economy of the country as a whole. They hold over the heads of the American people the threat of inflation and they tie that to what they call the unrestricted power of unions to exact exorbitant wage demands. In other words, the country is facing a catastrophe, we are told, and the culprit is the organized labor movement.

Let me say something about power. We know what power is. We meet it across the bargaining tables. We see it in the management structure from one end of this country to another. I have no objection to a powerful trade union movement and I don't see why anyone else should have an objection so long as that power is directed toward the good of the country as a whole.

And I contend that when we improve the standards of life of all of the American people, when we build up the purchasing power that keeps this dynamic economy of ours the envy of the entire world, when we fight to eliminate disease and poverty, when we struggle to bring millions of people under the minimum wage law—people who do not belong to our unions—when we use our dollars and our prestige and our time in order to build up democracy in South America and Africa and Asia on the very simple theory that by building up democracy in those lands we make democracy a little safer here at home—when we do all of these things, when we contribute one-third of the money contributed to the great charitable organizations in this country, when we do all of these things I submit that we are using our power for the good of the country as a whole, not selfishly for ourselves.

Yet we hear this charge that labor is going to be responsible in advance for a catastrophe that is supposed to be hanging over our heads. It's a funny thing about some of these economics professors. It seems that there are two kinds of money in this country: the money that goes into the pay envelope of the worker in some way contributes to inflation; the money that goes into the astronomical profits which we read about every day—one corporation after another breaking one record after another; the tremendous dividends which are distributed; the fabulous salaries to the corporation executives; the stock option plans by which they get some kind of special treatment—that kind of money is not inflationary; it is only the money that the fellow in overalls gets in his pay envelope that is inflationary, according to these economic jitterbugs who predict our ruin.

Industry's Lobbyists at Work

We have millions of people in this country who are not under the minimum wage law, who get less than $1.25 an hour, and I can tell you they get a whole lot less than $1.25 an hour. There are industries which are not covered, simply because the people running those industries have been powerful enough as lobbyists in Washington to keep these people from the coverage of the minimum wage law.

We have tens of thousands of people in this country who are fully employed—fully employed, but also on relief. We are told that the subsistence level for a family in this country—just a bare subsistence level—is something over $3,000. And still we have these millions of people outside the minimum wage law getting less than $1.25 an hour. And let me say to you that $1.25 an hour is a poverty wage. Even so, we are told by these economists, some of them on the government payroll, that a substantial increase in the minimum wage to a $1.75 or $2 level would bring about tremendous inflation.

And we are told—I only heard this the other day—that the attitude of these economists toward the minimum wage law is that it must be within the "guidelines." So you tell somebody who is getting 50 and 60 cents a hour—and that is not a figure plucked out of the air, that is an actual figure being paid in laundries in Washington—you tell them that they have to be governed by the "guidelines" in any legislation raising the minimum wage.

We don't know what is going to happen to the legislation that we seek, such as the minimum wage, but I think the time has come for organized labor to analyze its political situation and see just what it is that we must do.

Let's take a look at the Democratic Party. We find that most of the people who support the ideals and the principles of organized labor, most of the people who support better working conditions, decent hours, decent wages—most of them have a Democratic label. But that doesn't mean that the Democratic Party as a whole is the party of liberalism or the party of progress. Nor does it say that the Democratic Party can deliver its own members on Capitol Hill. We know full well that there are a substantial number of members of that party from the Southern part of this nation, who have a completely perfect record insofar as labor is concerned—they are 100 percent against everything we stand for. So it is quite obvious that if we are looking around for a party to adopt or control, we don't want the Democratic Party because they can't deliver.

Then you take the Republican Party, the party that is known mostly as the conservative party. However, we find a number of Republicans, on the House floor and in the Senate, who go along pretty well with labor's programs. The trouble is that the minute they get the reputation of going along with labor's program they lose whatever influence they have in the party. In fact, some of America's great men have been read out of the Republican Party because they didn't conform to the line as laid down by the financial interests, who somehow over the years seem to control these people.

Labor Looks at the Parties

So we can't say the Republican Party is the party of reaction and the Democratic Party the party of progress, because we do find within the Republican Party some people who are progressive and we do find within the Democratic Party some people who are definitely reactionary.

Now, you may say, "Well, are you thinking about setting up labor's own political party?" No, I don't think that would make much sense, because we have been going along under a non-partisan policy for many years. We are writing a record that cannot be equaled by any trade union movement anywhere else in the world, and we are the only major trade union movement in the entire free world that does not have a definite close affiliation with a political party.

So you can't buy either party. We don't want to set up our own party. So what do we do? Well, we follow the Gompers policy. And let me make this crystal clear. Every once in a while I read an anti-labor article in one of the papers or magazines which says that labor has drifted away from the Gompers policy, that Gompers was non-political. This is not so. Gompers was just as political as any other labor leader of his time, and perhaps more than most. But he was non-partisan. He believed that labor should support people rather than labels, and support them on the basis of their attitude and their voting record on the things in which labor is interested.

Now this means that we work with COPE, that we don't work with any political party—whether it is Republican, Democrat or anything else. And let me say, speaking for myself alone, that I don't buy the idea and there is nothing in the record to sustain the idea, that labor needs the Democratic Party. I am sure it is the other way around.

I am not the least bit pessimistic about what has happened. After all, in the field of labor legislation, going back over the years, we find that you get a setback now and a setback then. But in the final analysis, when you look at the picture from the very inception of the American trade union movement, right up to this minute, it has been a picture of constant progress, constant advance, constant improvement in the conditions of life and of work for the American wage earner and his family. And I am sure that it is going to continue to be that way.

Labor—Politics

Labor's Political Frustrations

A. H. RASKIN

A MOOD of frustration grips organized labor, and the thing that frustrates it most is the absence of any effective way to express it. Union leaders are angry at the White House and Congress. They are convinced that the administration's wage-price guideposts short-change unions; they are equally convinced that their pet bills get kicked around on Capitol Hill with no meaningful effort by President Johnson to save them.

Yet threats that labor will strike back by boycotting Democrats at the Congressional elections this fall have a hollow sound even to those who make them. In only a handful of districts will labor have anywhere else to go. The heads of the AFL-CIO and of its maritime and construction departments spent two rainy weeks in Florida in February, and their remarks about labor's political tribulations in Washington were as doleful as the weather. But a few days after they all got back to the capital, George Meany was at the White House to assure the President that they didn't mean any of it personally. Walter Reuther had already been there with the same message.

Despite these assurances, the reversal of political sentiment in recent months has been both abrupt and startling. Meany opened his presidential report to last December's Federation convention in San Francisco with this ebullient passage: "At no time in the ten-year history of the AFL-CIO has the United States seemed more surely on the road toward fulfillment of the American dream—the creation of a national society whose every member can fully and equally pursue his own destiny; a society from which poverty and economic fear has been banished; a society of true abundance for all. The New Deal proclaimed by Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1933 has come to belated maturity under Lyndon B. Johnson in 1965."

Less than three months later, in a news conference after the midwinter meeting of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, Meany wound up an acid review of labor's 1966 political disappointments with a flat declaration that it could get along quite well "without the Democrats and without the Republicans." That sounded for a minute like the prelude to formation of an independent Labor Party on the British model, but Meany lost no time in making clear that was not what he had in mind—at least not yet.

As he defined it, his idea was that unions could make their own way politically by being "choosy where we spend our money." He rejected the notion that labor had no option except to depend on the Democrats for political handouts. "Some of the Democrats seem to feel that we've got to go along with them, that we've got no other place to go," Meany said. "But if to go along with them means we go along with the Eastlands, the Sparkmans, the Herman Talmadges, Holland, Ellender, etc., we've always gone along without them. I don't buy the idea that we have to toady behind any political party."

BEFORE looking deeper into this proclamation of political emancipation, it is worthwhile to examine how much validity there is to labor's current complaints. On the guideposts, there is a good deal. The concept underlying these wage-price regulators remains sound, but it was always questionable that they could be made to work without excessive rigidity or unfairness. Labor has strong grounds for feeling that their application is hurtful to unions in a period when they are having a hard enough time demonstrating that they have not run out of function.

The guideposts were introduced in the 1962 report of President Kennedy's Council of Economic Advisers, with the expressed hope that they would spur widespread discussion of what standards the public could apply to judge whether wage-price decisions in major industries were "in the national interest." Since then, unratified by anyone, the guideposts have become institutionalized as the measuring rod of labor-management responsibility. Their fundamental tenet is that price stability can best be maintained by gearing total wage increases to the over-all increases in the productivity of American industry.

That idea was not invented by President Kennedy or by Walter W. Heller, his chief economic adviser, or even by that most active of activists, Arthur J. Goldberg, then Secretary of Labor. It got its first important acceptance in collective bargaining in 1948 when Charles E. Wilson, as president of General Motors, broached it as a means of giving workers and consumers a direct stake in expanded industrial efficiency; every Big Three auto contract since then has embodied this "progress-sharing" principle. The anti-inflation preachments of President Eisenhower leaned heavily on the doctrine that keeping pay and productivity in balance was the only dependable safeguard against a price spiral; all that Kennedy did was to turn a sermon into a formula.

Neither he nor anyone around him intended the formula to become a straitjacket into which every individual corporate and union decision would have to fit. On the contrary, the 1962 report accented the importance of encouraging maximum flexibility at the bargining table to take account of the distinctive problems in each industry. Employers with labor shortages and low wage scales were advised to exceed the productivity yardstick on higher wages; those with an ample labor supply and high scales were urged to do the opposite.

Thus the guideposts left plenty of room for correcting inequities and even for changing the division of the economic pie between labor and capital so long as the bill was not passed on to the rest of the economy in the form of higher prices. In general, the CEA urged price cuts where productivity or profits were high as a counterweight to any price increases that might have to be made in low-productivity fields.

Whether the necessary elasticity ever could have been maintained in such a system of voluntary restraints is doubtful, but whatever chance might otherwise have existed evaporated when President Kennedy collided with the steel industry over prices in April, 1962. After that crackdown the White House had to give earnest after earnest of its intention to be as resolute in defending the public interest against union excesses as it had been in running a bulldozer over Big Steel.

The result was the translation of the formula into a precise figure of 3.2 per cent, which miraculously became the touchstone of equity under any and all circumstances. That is, it became the magic number for all industries big enough to be visible from the portico of the White House. Such highly spotlighted national negotiations as those in steel, autos, aluminum, railroads, and shipping had to pass scrutiny on how well or poorly they conformed to the guideposts.

No comparable inhibition restrained unions in industries like construction and trucking, where settlements often have a much more direct impact on living costs than those in mass production. These unions do much of their negotiating on a local or regional basis and thumb their nose at the productivity standard. Yet, even with all the fat contracts the building-trades unions and the Teamsters have dragged through this side door, and the over-ceiling raises other powerful unions have obtained from corporate giants, improvements in the total wage level have barely kept up with rising productivity in the five years of the Kennedy-Johnson boom.

Indeed, the best available Federal statistics indicate that in manufacturing and most other major sectors, the average pay increase has fallen short of the 3.2 per cent annual measure. The CEA itself acknowledges in its 1966 report that "Wage movements of recent years must clearly be characterized as moderate." This is not to say that workers in the basic industries are suffering; the consistent availability of overtime work at premium pay, especially in autos and steel, has more than made up for any lag in basic hourly rates. The real shutouts, as usual, have been workers in the traditionally low-wage fields, where union organization is spotty, runaway competition keen, and skill requirements minimal.

The union complaint against the restrictive effect of the guideposts is heightened by the omission from the 3.2 per cent barometer of any allowance for the erosion that rising prices have inflicted on pay checks. The increase of one and a half to two per cent a year in the consumer price index has made a mirage of half of the increase in purchasing power the productivity formula is supposed to assure the workers.

The difficulty, of course, is that any adjustment the CEA might authorize to offset the shrinkage in the dollar and thus provide a "real" increase of 3.2 per cent would itself contribute to more inflation. It is the same dilemma that brought wage-escalator clauses (under which pay rates automatically rise or fall with the price index) into economic disfavor in the Eisenhower era. The steel industry finally got rid of its escalator in 1960 on the ground that it had become a generator, rather than a corrective, of the inflationary spiral.

Gripes and Pinches

Labor has two other big gripes against the guideposts. The first is that they operate to hold down wages while profits are allowed to soar unchecked. The other is that the formula itself was changed this year—without any semblance of collective bargaining—to rule out what should have been an automatic advance of 3.6 per cent instead of 3.2. The CEA merely decreed that 3.2 per cent was more reflective of the rate at which efficiency is likely to rise this year than the 3.6 improvement average for the last five years. The President agreed, and labor decided it had to hit the ceiling—and go through it.

The second complaint might have been less virulent if the spectacular rise in corporate earnings had not made labor's sensibilities so touchy about the first. Industrial profits after taxes have gone up five times as fast as average factory wages in the New Frontier-Great Society period. It is true that since profits started at a relatively depressed level and since they always fluctuate with the ups and downs of the business cycle in a way that wages don't, such a comparison does not really tell very much about how equitably the fruits of prosperity are being divided. Nevertheless, even a labor movement that often outdoes the United States Chamber of Commerce in extolling free enterprise has found it hard to remain mute while returns for investors race from one Himalayan peak to a still higher one. Thus, when General Motors reported pre-tax earnings last year of $4.1 billion and after-tax earnings of $2.1 billion, the labor press promptly informed union members that a G.M. worker would have had to earn $8,000 a year for more than half a million years to make as much as the company did before the tax collectors put in their bill.

The CEA recognized from the outset that voluntary wage limits would be vulnerable if the principal result of sitting on pay envelopes was to enrich corporate treasuries. In its 1964 report, with the recovery well advanced and profits shooting skyward, the Council underscored its initial suggestion that price reductions be used as a device for moderating profits and cutting the consumer in on productivity's blessings. It noted dourly that "large industrial enterprises thus far have not widely heeded this advice" and it warned that the resulting pile-up of profits was liable to constitute a lure for strongly intensified wage demands.

ACCURATE as that warning has proved, it is only fair to point out the complexities that a giant corporation like General Motors would have faced if it sought to reduce the embarrassingly high level of its profits by giving its workers more or charging its customers less. The last Big Three auto settlement, under a pattern initiated by Chrysler, called for package increases substantially above the 3.2 per cent figure. If G.M. had gone higher still, its action would not only have pushed up the ante for all American employers but would also have enabled it to pirate skilled labor from its automotive competitors in a time of incipient labor scarcity.

Lower prices for G.M. cars probably would have proved even more dislocative in their impact on Ford and Chrysler. Certainly American Motors, already on the ragged edge, would have been hard pressed to match the cuts. Even putting more money into G.M. safety or quality would reflect itself in greater dominance over its market by this biggest manufacturing enterprise.

It is precisely because union leaders are aware of the difficulties inherent in any attempt at profit control that they have been so bitter at the administration's decision to keep the wage lid at 3.2 per cent this year when adherence to its own original standards would have pushed the figure up to 3.6 per cent. The technical reasons for the decision are too intricate to warrant rehearsal here, except to say that a strong economic argument can be advanced for what the White House did. But it is inescapable that the galling effect for labor was to deny it more Lebensraum on wages while the rich got richer without restraint.

THE PINCH of the formula will be felt particularly now because employers, especially those in industries requiring a high proportion of skilled employes, are worried about holding their help. They are amenable to jacking up wages to attract more workers, and unions that fail to press for increases well above the LBJ standard may find the rank and file taking command through wildcat strikes and the rejection of negotiated settlements. This already has emerged as an internal union problem in Midwest metalworking industries, where the manpower shortage is most acute.

The upshot has been a flat notice to the President by Meany and the rest of the AFL-CIO high command that the economy needs "a rapid restoration of balance between business profits and workers' buying power, rather than an increasingly unbalanced lag of wages and salaries behind profits and dividends."

The clincher in this warning that labor no longer intends to countenance the guideposts is apt to prove even less welcome at the White House. It pledges labor's support if the President certifies the existence of a national emergency requiring formal controls over prices, profits, dividends, executive salaries, bonuses, and stock options as well as wages. So far there has been no official response to this "equality of sacrifice" proposal.

Interestingly enough, while labor is declaring war on the administration's method of keeping wages in bounds, industry seems to have found a sophisticated and pragmatic way to coexist with the guideposts on the price side. The philosophic objections by top industrialists remain as vocal as ever, but they now shun dramatic confrontations of the type that produced the 1962 steel crisis. The current strategy is to make the White House an ally, rather than a foe, by submitting proposed increases for advance inspection by the CEA.

By way of making sure that the CEA will not gag at the proposals, the steel companies—with U.S. Steel in the vanguard—have coupled selective increases with downward revisions in a mixture so baffling that for weeks no one can tell precisely the end effect on the total price list. Quiet missionary work by the administration resulted in a rollback of higher cigarette prices by R. J. Reynolds, and there is reason to suspect Washington had a hand in persuading newsprint makers to cut in half an announced price rise of $10 a ton. These evidences of industry co-operation in fighting inflation coincided with a reverse demonstration by Pete Weber, who succeeded Joey Fay as head of the Operating Engineers in northern New Jersey. Weber, whose members now get well over $6 an hour, negotiated a contract providing increases of 7.5 to 9 per cent a year. When the CEA called him in to protest, he reopened the contract—to demand a still higher increase.

Durable 14(b)

On the Congressional front, the great letdown for the unions came with the administration's surrender to Senator Dirksen on repeal of the "right-to-work" section of the Taft-Hartley Act. The bill to knock out Section 14(b) and thus strip the states of their present authority to outlaw the union shop was the first purely labor measure on the AFL-CIO "must" list since President Kennedy's inauguration.

Until last year, unions had put all bread-and-butter bills in a secondary category and concentrated their lobbying on the bills for which the White House wanted priority in the general interest. The Federation overrode its own protectionist elements to back the Trade Expansion Act. Next it went all out for the Kennedy-Johnson tax cut, even though all of labor's favored ideas on closing tax loopholes and on preventing a major share of the reductions from going to corporations and millionaires quickly went into the ashcan. Finally, it brushed aside the reservations of Jim Crow unions and fought for an even stronger Civil Rights Act than the administration had originally recommended.

When the House of Representatives voted to repeal Section 14(b) last July, labor foresaw an easy triumph in the Senate. Relations with the White House were more cordial than they had been under Kennedy, Truman, or FDR. In fact, Johnson was telling his intimates that there were no two men in Washington he could trust so completely as Meany and Andrew J. Biemiller, the AFL-CIO's chief legislative representative. The President invited them both to fly out to the Truman Library in Independence, Missouri, in Air Force 1 so they could be with him when he signed the Medicare bill.

A chill began to descend over the relationship when a Dirksen-engineered filibuster prevented the "right-to-work" repealer from coming to a vote last year. But the session had been so full of Great Society accomplishments that labor could forgive Johnson for not wanting to do any more arm twisting. Its forbearance gave out this year when the administration put up only token resistance to a Dirksen repeat performance. The unions were irked most by the evidence of two test votes that they had enough support to get the measure through the Senate if they could ever get a majority decision on the merits. But the two-thirds margin needed to stifle the filibuster was obviously unobtainable, and the administration meekly folded its tent.

Labor's next run-in with the White House was over liberalization of the Federal minimum wage of $1.25 an hour. The unions have set $2 as their idea of an appropriate wage floor, but they were willing to compromise on a three-step rise to $1.75. The CEA took the view that the 3.2 per cent anti-inflation standard ought to govern improvements in the minimum; otherwise a rise would jeopardize price stability by unsettling wage relationships all the way up the economic ladder. A meeting between Meany and the President finally brought a compromise, under which LBJ said he would not veto a bill that pushed the bottom wage up to $1.40 next February 1 and $1.60 a year after that. But he left it up to labor's lobbyists to muster the necessary votes on Capitol Hill.

Who'll Offer a Choice?

Will the product of all this bickering be a decision by the AFL-CIO to sit on its hands in the November election? The best answer was undoubtedly provided by Meany himself at the December convention. He made it clear that he could see no excuse for the 14(b) repealer failing to pass if labor's friends in the Senate worked as hard for it as labor had worked for them. But he added that he knew of "no more foolish and dangerous nonsense" than the idea that union members should express their resentment against such a failure by pulling out of labor's political-action programs. To do so, he said, would be to give labor's enemies a double victory, eliminating the unions "as an effective force in American political life."

Meany's tone had changed a good deal by the time he got to Florida after the filibuster had won and the guideposts had been juggled to labor's displeasure. But the logic is still the same; politics remains too basic a determinant of labor's welfare for it to go fishing at election time. The real question is whether the Republicans will ever provide it with a genuine choice—and that doesn't mean Goldwater. One man who appears to be trying is Governor Rockefeller in New York, who beat the Democrats to the punch by proposing a faster step-up in the New York wage floor than ever came out of Washington horse trading. But Rockefeller's wooing of the labor vote is not the conventional Republican style. So the virtual certainty is that once again the vast bulk of labor's endorsements and campaign cash will go to Democrats. Even if there were any real sentiment for an independent Labor Party—which there isn't—unions are so estranged from most of the liberal-left movements these days that nothing approaching a coalition is possible. For all their current frustration, the unions have become too integral an adjunct of the American Establishment (Democratic Branch) to play any vanguard role in effecting a basic political realignment, much less an upheaval.

The place where their unhappiness will express itself most is in more pressure and more strikes for that oldest of union goals—"more." The sad part is that each such strike, particularly where a key industry or a vital municipal agency is shut down, will simply alienate a few more of labor's old supporters and leave it more isolated as a political force. The productivity yardstick, despite the patent inequity with which it has operated, remains a better protection against inflation than a dreary resumption of the wage-price leapfrog that did so much to cheapen the dollar after the Second World War. Neither workers nor the rest of the community gain when higher wages are eaten up by still higher prices. The administration will have to use something more than warmed-over admonitions from the Eisenhower days if this floodgate of inflation is to stay shut.

Historic Reversal for the FCC

THREE JUDGES of the U.S. Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia, in a lucid, historic opinion, have literally changed the rules of broadcasting regulation—opening the way for the public to have a voice in determining whether a station has operated in the public interest. They held, on March 25, 1966, that the Federal Communications Commission erred in renewing the license of WLBT, a television station in Jackson, Mississippi, and they directed the Commission to hold hearings on the station's renewal application.

The case, under FCC scrutiny since 1955, would never have come to so unexpected and stunning a denouement, had it not been for the Office of Communication of The United Church of Christ, directed by the Reverend Everett C. Parker. In 1964 the church petitioned the Commission to deny WLBT's application for renewal. It asked for hearings to present evidence that the station was guilty of racial and religious discrimination and of excessive commercialism. The FCC, by a four to two vote, dismissed the petition and granted the Jackson station a restricted, conditional license renewal for one year instead of the customary three.

The Commission, in effect, thus accepted the charges of the church's Office of Communication, but ruled that the city "needed" a second TV station, and put WLBT on probation. Chairman E. William Henry and Commissioner Kenneth A. Cox dissented vigorously from the majority view, arguing that a renewal could not properly be granted until hearings resolved factual issues raised by the church petition. Ordinarily that would have ended the matter: the FCC had "ducked" another tough case, shown leniency to a licensee, and refused to give a public group, the United Church of Christ, "standing" which would have made hearings mandatory under the provisions of the Communications Act.

The right to intervene officially in a license renewal had been granted only on grounds of "economic injury" or "electrical interference." Standing, thus, traditionally had been granted to competing stations but not to the listening public. Presumably the audience did not suffer any "injury," and allowing it standing "would pose great administrative burdens" on the Commission. Mr. Parker, backed by his church, deemed the matter too important to drop. Ignoring the gloomy predictions of top communications lawyers, he appealed the FCC decision to the federal court.

The Court of Appeals judges—Burger, McGowan and Tamm—had probably never attended a convention of the National Association of Broadcasters. More interested in theoretical law than in industry practices, they looked at the record and stood the FCC on its head at every point of the argument. They emphasized that "standing is accorded to persons not for the protection of their private interests but only to vindicate the public interest."

"We cannot believe," the judges added, "that the Congressional mandate of public participation . . . was meant to be limited to writing letters to the Commission, to inspection of records, to the Commission's grace in considering listener claims, or to mere non-participating appearance at hearings . . . Consumers are generally among the best vindicators of the public interest. In order to safeguard the public interest in broadcasting, therefore, we hold that some 'audience participation' must be allowed in license renewal proceedings."

As for WLBT's license, it is not long for this world if the FCC takes seriously one sentence of the Court's opinion: "We agree that a history of programing misconduct of the kind alleged would preclude, as a matter of law, the required finding that renewal of the license would serve the public interest." The key phrase is "as a matter of law." It suggests the irrelevance of any reforms WLBT may adopt during its probationary period. "When past performance is in conflict with public interest," the judges said, " a very heavy burden rests on the renewal applicant to show how a renewal can be reconciled with the public interest."

The judges squelched the FCC's argument that Jackson "needed" the WLBT renewal, even though the station had been unfair to its Negro community (50 per cent of the area population). The area, said the Court, might better be served "with one TV outlet acutely conscious that adherence to the fairness doctrine is a sine qua non of every licensee." The Commission, thoroughly spanked, has decided not to appeal to the Supreme Court; and it has ordered a hearing. WLBT could appeal, but it would be foolish to go to the high court with a case so apparently blemished with racial discrimination. The church's Office of Communication, preparing for the hearing, reports that the station even now is still discriminating against the Jackson Negro community.

Mr. Parker deserves an award for courageous public service. His church has shown the way not only to other churches concerned with the impact of the media on their congregations, but also to civic associations, professional societies, unions, and educational institutions. Captious or purely obstructive protests are not in order. But informed, organized monitoring and evaluating of performance versus promise, as the court stated, can provide "a means for reflection of listener appraisal" of a licensee's statutory obligation to operate in the public interest.

Perhaps the FCC in the future will hesitate to renew a license without a hearing when serious issues of fact are involved, and stations will hesitate before politely brushing off complaints from articulate public groups.

Monticello and After

The Shackles of Power: Three Jeffersonian Decades, by John Dos Passos (Doubleday. 426 pp. $6.95), sees thirty years in early American history through the personalities that shaped it. Harry Hansen, a member of the Society of American Historians, has been editor of the World Almanac since 1948.*

By HARRY HANSEN

JOHN DOS PASSOS's latest exploration in the tangled political jungle of the young Republic, The Shackles of Power, results in a report of what he calls the "three Jeffersonian decades." The survey begins with January 1807, when Jefferson is trying to dispose of the issues that have plagued him while President before retiring to Monticello: the need to acquire the Floridas, to stop British harassment of American shipping, and to check the conspiracies of Aaron Burr and the New England Federalists. It continues through the Administrations of Madison and Monroe into that of John Quincy Adams, when the spirit of Jeffersonian democracy still carried weight in the counsels of the nation.

Mr. Dos Passos long has been an interpreter of Jefferson, and the title of one of his books, The Head and Heart of Thomas Jefferson, shows that he recognizes something besides brain power in the great Virginian. In his new work he weaves his knowledge of Jefferson's personal concerns together with acts of historic importance in a running narrative, so that the happenings of 160 years ago read like the daily reports in newspapers, a continuous account of a man dealing with the incidents of his day. This does not imply that Mr. Dos Passos overworks the use of personal detail; rather, he shows that a human being at the head of a state is still a human being; that Jefferson, suffering from interminable headaches and complaining of "the daily drudgeries of my duty," was able at the same time to deal objectively with the Embargo Act and the threat of war.

While Jefferson's acts and ideas are the main concern of this book, both the President's associates and his enemies are portrayed with equal attention to their qualities and failings. Mr. Dos Passos is not neutral; he is on Jefferson's side. In a long biographical account he stresses the evil influence of Burr; he appreciates the various Adamses, but warns against their bias, and he gives a just estimate of Gallatin's services. Madison was so closely associated with Jefferson that at times their conferences in Monticello practically made that the capitol of the United States.

The shackles of power fall from Jefferson's shoulders to those of Madison quite early in the book, but although Jefferson can "retire" and count his artichokes and asparagus shoots, look after his family circle, and adapt classical architecture to Virginia's needs, he remains at the call of his associates and his influence persists. Mr. Dos Passos has a subject that gives him full opportunity to disclose the sacred and the profane, to move from diplomacy and partisan politics to husbandry, public schools, higher education, plans for getting rid of slavery, and a dozen other topics. He has even investigated the gossip that proved "irresistible" to Jefferson's contemporaries—that of "Dusky Sal," or Sally Heming, reputed to be Jefferson's mulatto mistress and mother of a brood that resembled him. Jefferson never mentioned the subject, and the best explanation seemed to be that Peter Carr, one of his nephews, was the culprit.

This book is a history of three decades seen with the help of personalities. Inside that frame Mr. Dos Passos accounts for the War of 1812, the battles with the Indians, the troubles of the United States Bank, the centralizing decisions of Chief Justice John Marshall, a cousin whose views alienated Jefferson; the origins of the Monroe Doctrine, the Treaty of Ghent, Castlereagh's diplomatic career, Napoleon's retreat from Moscow—by way of Joel Barlow—and the observations on democracy by the inquisitive foreigner Tocqueville. Mr. Dos Passos's writing moves along rapidly, but his fluency is disarming, for actually he has done a great deal of patient research and consulted original papers in many collections for this volume.

The Tammany Side of the Story

Behind Closed Doors: Politics in the Public Interest, by Edward N. Costikyan (Harcourt, Brace & World. 369 pp. $6.95), explains the nature of modern urban politics. William D. Ogdon is a member of The New York Times editorial board.*

By WILLIAM D. OGDON

EDWARD N. COSTIKYAN pleads guilty to being the first leader of Tammany Hall to write a book. Some Tammany bosses of the more distant past may never have read one. But Mr. Costikyan is of the new breed of city politician—literate, and even fastidious in his tastes, a musician in his spare time, and a lawyer by profession.

Politics is not a life career with him; he moves in and out of it at will. Although in politics for nearly fifteen years, his tenure as New York County Democratic chairman (succeeding Carmine G. DeSapio) lasted only thirty-two months, ending in November 1964. He departed in what was reported at the time to be a disagreement with the then Mayor Robert F. Wagner over patronage and political support from City Hall.

Within a few months, however, he was back in political harness, managing the successful Democratic primary campaign for mayor by Abraham D. Beame, who defeated the Wagner protégé, Paul R. Screvane. His credentials as a campaign manager and a political prophet were impaired on election day in November. John V. Lindsay was elected mayor, in spite of Costikyan's election-eve forecast that Beame would win by well over 100,000 votes.

Behind Closed Doors is a misleading title if it encourages the reader to expect scandalous disclosures about what goes on in smoke-filled rooms of New York political clubhouses. For, as Edward Costikyan warns, this is not a "kiss-and-tell" book.

It is really several books. It is an adult primer of how to get out the vote, and swing it your way if possible, through the awful drudgery of pushing doorbells and trying to get into New York apartments. It is a book that tells how the district captain builds his strength, how he scrounges for money to pay legitimate expenses. It is a debunking book, laying to rest the "myths" that aspirant money often buys nomination to public office, including judgeships; that delegates to state party conventions have any individual autonomy of their own; that Bar Association endorsements of candidates for judgeships are the final and uncontestable distillation of impartial, holy wisdom, and that political chairmen have sinister and almost unlimited power over government.

MR. COSTIKYAN is a strong believer in the political party as an agent for "good government," and mourns the decline of its influence. He is a middle-roader in the "reform" movement in New York Democratic politics, a former law partner and devoted admirer of the late Adlai E. Stevenson. He was the man chosen by Wagner to succeed Mr. DeSapio as Tammany boss, whom he describes as a man "obsessed" by ego. Wagner he believes to be a "political genius."

But he is level-headed about the "reformers," noting their almost unanimous interest in patronage on their way to "regularity." And although Costikyan ran a clean shop as Tammany leader, he retained some of the standards hallowed in the past.

He defends the racial and religious "balancing" of tickets as a sound manifestation of democracy. He is somewhat ungenerous to the Liberal Party, which he says has become a tail for someone else's kite. Costikyan doesn't say so, but this conviction was probably confirmed when the Liberal Party abandoned the Democratic Party for once and went with Lindsay. He apparently sees nothing wrong with offering a government job to a man as a "sensible solution" to avoid a primary fight. But he was willing to battle to the bitter end to keep a candidate with "an honest-to-God police record" off the ballot.

He explains the wariness of political leaders in accepting a "newcomer" as a candidate for public office; they are uneasy, not knowing what heinous blunder these neophytes may commit on the stump. The leaders feel more comfortable, and confident, with candidates they have seen around the clubhouses and worked with while pounding the pavements.

Although he defends national political conventions, Costikyan takes a dim view of the state nominating process in

Saturday Review

New York. The mistakes of a state convention "take about three years to clear up." Representing a "disoriented collection of separate fiefdoms," a state convention is more subject to "deals." The delegate is "the property of his leader." Costikyan doubts that Charles Buckley, the old-line Bronx Democratic boss, ever polled his delegates. He knew how they ought to vote, and he voted them.

Mr. Costikyan wants the public to reevaluate politicians, and stop thinking of them as thieves. He laments the passing of "boss" power to those who preside in public office, and points to the dangers that come of the increasing supremacy of civil service unions. Although Mr. Costikyan holds the press in rather low esteem, apparently he condones "use" of the press, by politicians, for political purposes.

In general, however, Mr. Costikyan takes the high road of politics, rather than the low. In view of the dearth, in recent years, of able, informed books about the fascinating scene of New York politics, it is cause for regret that this book does not bring us more candid and ample disclosure of what does go on "behind closed doors" and a better insight into the chief characters who have crossed the stage in Edward Costikyan's time.

If he, with his vast opportunity to observe, had told us what he really thought of Wagner, Robert Kennedy, Beame, Adam Clayton Powell, DeSapio, Charles Buckley, Stanley Steingut of Brooklyn, Averell Harriman, Nelson Rockefeller, Frank Hogan, and of the king-making intrigues, as well as the campaigns of recent years, this could have been an excitingly interesting book instead of a constructively didactic but somewhat dull one. The author then could have brought more persuasiveness to his diagnosis of politics an an "addiction."

BUT even if Mr. Costikyan, as the gentleman in politics, has made no adversary mad, he has delivered with conviction the earnest truth that until people—good people—rid themselves of the notion that politics at the ward and district level is somehow not quite respectable, they will be condemned to live with the consequences. If they will not enroll in a party of their choice, get into the clubhouses, work at the level where nomination to party and public office has its genesis, and run for office themselves, they cannot complain when mediocrity is all they have to vote for as November comes around.

Mr. Costikyan is a great believer in the power of priorities properly evaluated and executed. He is trying to tell us that representative, democratized politics is the first priority on the way to better government, in New York and everywhere else.

Labor Politics

Labor outlook

BW

September 3, 1966

Labor's passion for politics may be waning

Union members may be more apathetic than usual even for an off-year election this fall. This worry is growing among Democratic leaders and AFL-CIO officials whose job is to whip up political action.

They count on the rank and file for registration and get-out-the-vote drives. But many among the membership are showing a skepticism bordering on resentment toward the traditional drumbeating for Democratic candidates. Some union higher-ups share this feeling privately.

If this trend turns out to be substantial, it could mean a basic change in the way labor participates in the coming campaign.

The problem: Democrats didn't deliver

Ironically, today's apathy may be an outgrowth of the overwhelming support labor gave President Johnson in 1964. Many laborites worked like demons to elect Johnson and an overpoweringly Democratic Congress, and they are disappointed by the results. As they see it:

- The President tried to limit wage increases to 3.2% at a time when high profits and rising living costs made bigger raises both possible and necessary.
- Congress turned down repeal of Taft-Hartley Section 14(b) and legalization of situs picketing—both issues dear to labor's heart.

To be sure, most labor leaders who feel this way go on to give the Administration credit for accomplishments in fields outside labor—medicare, for instance. And most concede that their legislation would have even poorer chances in a less heavily Democratic Congress.

But it's not easy to rally troops with the slogan that things could be worse.

Support will be weaker . . .

Intellectually, labor may acknowledge that its interests lie with the Democrats. But emotionally, many unionists would like to punish a President who, they feel, let them down. This kind of conflict is likely to result in inaction. In any case, it won't help fuel a dynamic attempt to mobilize union members, who may have other reasons to hold back their support anyway—dissatisfaction with Vietnam policy, for example.

Of course, the political fervor of stalwarts such as AFL-CIO President George Meany is undimmed. And few union presidents have changed position publicly; they are reluctant to offend Meany—or to encourage Republicans.

Even so, it all adds up to the likelihood of a weaker labor role this fall than in past campaigns.

. . . and different in style

This doesn't mean that labor's tried-and-true friends need worry. There will still be staunch labor support for such men as Senators Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.) and Clifford P. Case (R-N. J.)

But there won't be solid support for Democrats down the line.

So labor's participation may well be different in style as well as diminished in zeal. Manpower and money may be concentrated more on specific candidates of both parties—though still mostly Democrats. In the past, labor resources often were available to the Democratic Party for use at its own discretion.

It's an ominous possibility for some freshmen Democratic congressmen whose future could hinge on a few thousand voters—or perhaps on the AFL-CIO volunteers who got those voters to the polls last time around.

PAGINATION INCORRECT

Labor & Votes: AFL-CIO Plans Biggest Off-Year Election Push

Primary Blows

The primary defeat of Tennessee's Sen. Ross Bass, a down-the-line Democratic liberal, shook AFL-CIO officials more than they care to admit. COPE's failure to unseat conservative Rep. Walter Baring in the Nevada Democratic primary "broke our hearts," says a union strategist. Liberal Rep. Carlton Sickles' loss in his bid for the Maryland Democratic gubernatorial nomination was another blow.

Now Sen. Douglas is rated in deep trouble. Union men are worried, too, over the re-election chances of Montana's Sen. Lee Metcalf, long a liberal Democratic stalwart. They fear a gubernatorial victory by Mr. Reagan could sweep five or six California Democrats out of Congress. The gubernatorial races in Ohio and Michigan, where Govs. James Rhodes and George Romney are rated strong Republican ticket leaders, "could affect a number of House seats," frets an AFL-CIO aide.

White rank-and-file reaction to racial rioting and to Negro pressures for open housing and other gains raise more worries. "You're damn right there's a backlash," says an AFL-CIO official, "and our people are not immune to it." In the Maryland Democratic gubernatorial primary supposed dark horse George Mahoney, who ran on the slogan "a man's home is his castle" and promised to veto any open occupancy legislation, defeated two candidates who came out for limited fair housing laws. A big factor was a heavy pro-Mahoney vote in white worker districts in Baltimore.

An added sign that open occupancy is a strong but silent issue among white union members is supplied by this anecdote: Just before a recent primary, a union offical asked a rank-and-filer why he was going to vote against the candidate COPE had endorsed when both leading candidates were taking the same stand on fair housing. "I know that," came the answer, "but I also know that my guy is lying and your guy is telling the truth."

Sighs a COPE aide: "How do you handle this issue? It's like handling a bowl of Jello with no bowl."

Other labor strategists express concern about the political impact of the rising cost of living. "The union housewife can get just as mad at price increases as any other housewife," says an AFL-CIO official. "And they always get maddest at the party in power."

Also worrisome to national labor chiefs is a tendency for some unions to go their own way, often to the benefit of Republicans whom labor's top political hierarchy opposes.

The Pennsylvania AFL-CIO is miffed over the endorsement of Lt. Gov. Raymond Shafer for governor by one of the Keystone State Federation's own vice presidents; the labor group backs Democratic candidate Milton Shapp. New York City building trades unions are supporting Gov. Nelson Rockefeller against the wishes of some other labor leaders. Craft unions in Ohio lean toward GOP Gov. Rhodes, while the state AFL-CIO backs Democratic hopeful Frazier Reams, Jr. This tendency stems in part, of course, from local unions' desire to be on the side of a prospective winner and collect credit for their backing.

UAW Votes for Romney?

Also, there seems to be a tendency for union rank-and-filers to ignore the endorsements of their chiefs and back Republicans. United Auto Workers officials fear Mr. Romney will win many of their members' votes, despite the union leadership's drive against him.

But for the most part, says a union politico, labor leaders' biggest fear is "not that our guys will go out and vote Republican, but that they just won't vote. Our problem is to get the members fired up."

This means pouring unstinting effort into campaign mechanics, such as the telephone efforts to find out what union members think and how they're going to vote—and thus what the key issues are and how candidates should handle them. "Union housewives are lonely, just like any other housewife; they love to talk on the telephone," says a COPE official. "We find out all kinds of things." The COPE branch in Alameda County, California, expects to make no less than 50,000 phone calls between now and Election Day.

Significantly, more campaign cooperation is coming from some bigger unions these days, AFL-CIO officials declare. "The Steelworkers; Building Service Employes; State, County and Municipal Employes; the Machinists—they're all working with us more closely than before," one says. One reason, Federation aides confide, is the leadership changes in these unions since the 1964 election. Another reason, it is said, is Mr. Meany's determination to wring maximum political effort out of the AFL-CIO's unions.

Evidence of Mr. Meany's concern, COPE aides say, is his naming of high-level union task forces for the campaign battles in Illinois and California.

To help Sen. Douglas, Mr. Meany has named Herman Kenin, president of the Musicians' Union; Richard Walsh, head of the Stage Employes and Moving Picture Operators Union; I. W. Abel, chief of the Steelworkers; and George Harrison, president emeritus of the Railway Clerks.

To help re-elect Gov. Pat Brown in California, there's a group made up of Joseph Keenan, secretary-treasurer of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Paul Jennings, chief of the International Union of Electrical Workers; Paul Hall, head of the Seafarers Union; and Roy Siemiller, president of the Machinists.

Task Forces "Informed"

AFL-CIO officials say the task forces are "very informal" but have a distinct value. "When the head of a union comes into a territory where he has a lot of members, the guys are more inclined to listen and respond," says a COPE official.

Rank-and-file response is what the union strategists need—and not just at the polls on Election Day. "Our strength has always been in the manpower we can put into an election campaign, rather than large amounts of money," says a Federation aide. But manpower often amounts to the same thing as money.

"The work of elections is done by organizing forces of people to do a great many mechanical things for you," explains one union political operator.

"Unions have these forces of people already in being. They have an office, they have secretaries who can type news releases, stencils and mimeograph machines to put them out, they have meeting halls and people to set them up for a rally, their people know where the meeting hall is, and the union officials have lists of people to call to help fill the hall. Unions have printers who can do work for the candidate, they know how to get recordings done.

"These things can be terribly important when you want to get a statement out at 5 p.m. to release that evening. And the knowledge of how to do all this, along with the people to do it, is a valuable asset to a candidate. It frees him and his top people to concentrate on other areas of concern."

Krupp Steel Plant Cuts Hours

LONDON — A major West German steel maker, Fried, Krupp Huettenwerke A. G., cut production and employe workweeks due to lack of orders. The company, steelmaking arm of Fried, Krupp of Essen, a major diversified manufacturer, said the workweek at a plant in Bochum will be cut to 36 hours for 1,200 workers and to 38 hours for an additional 1,100. The plant's 15,500 workers normally work a 40 hour week.

Election Night

This score card will help you tally returns Election Night.

As early returns are reported, put check marks beside the candidates leading for Governor and the U.S. Senate. Use a pencil and keep an eraser handy. When returns are conclusive, cross out the names of the losers. For Congressmen, write in the number of Representatives elected by each party, state by state. Here are the major offices at stake:

Governors—Thirty-five states are electing Governors. Of these 35 Governorships, 20 are now held by Democrats, 15 by Republicans. Overall, in the 50 states, 33 Governors are Democrats and 17, Republicans. The Republicans must defend all but two of theirs, the Democrats about three-fifths of theirs.

U.S. Senators—Thirty-five U.S. Senate seats will be up for election Tuesday. Twenty of these are now held by Democrats, 15 by Republicans. The present lineup in the 100-member Senate is 67 Democrats and 33 Republicans. Thus, almost half the Republican seats will be on the block, but less than a third of the Democrats'.

U.S. Representatives—The entire U.S. House of Representatives—435 Congressmen—will be elected on Tuesday. The House right now includes 294 Democrats and 139 Republicans, with two vacancies.

The table below illustrates a political fact of life that labor is trying to reverse this year. That fact is that, since 1938, the party that controlled the White House invariably lost seats in the House in off-year elections. These were the elections in which there was no Presidential race, as is the case this year. The shaded boxes show those losses.

Because the Congress that has just adjourned did so much to benefit all Americans, labor is working extra hard to preserve its liberal majority and upset the off-year trend. That liberal majority included both Democrats and Republicans.

To accomplish this, liberal voters must go to the polls Tuesday in numbers approximating their turnout two years ago when the Presidential race led the ballot. That is labor's goal between now and the time the polls close Tuesday.

W. J. Adams marks 50th anniversary

MACHINIST PHOTO

Adams signs lodge records.

Congratulations are in order for William J. Adams of IAM Lodge 555, Knoxville, Tenn. He has just completed his 50th consecutive year as lodge financial secretary.

Brother Adams joined the IAM in 1907 as a member of Lodge 1, Atlanta, Ga. At that time he worked for the Hancock & Holmes Machine Co. He moved to Knoxville, Tenn., a few years later and was elected financial secretary in 1916.

Adams recalls that those were the days of the anti-union blacklist and the company spy. Union meetings were held in secret and lodge records were kept hidden.

"I remember one place I worked," he told THE MACHINIST, "where the manager would make the rounds of the shop to ask each man if he belonged to the union. Anyone who admitted belonging to the union would be told to go to the office and collect his pay."

Company spies were a problem. Once, when management seemed to know everything that was going on at the secret union meetings, lodge members set up an anti-spy network. Adams remembers that one man was singled out as suspect. The plant janitor kept his eye on this man and, sure enough, the man reported to management following every union meeting.

"He was expelled from the union immediately," Adams reports. He also remembers old working conditions:

"We worked long hours in those days. "When I joined the IAM in 1907, top pay for a machinist was $3.50 per day. No one guessed then just how much the union would improve our pay and working conditions."

During the depression of 1929, Adams and his fellow machinists helped support their families by making and selling a device for clamping lids on jars used for canning fruits and vegetables at home. He said:

"I got the idea for the clamp while watching a group of neighbor women canning peaches. You could buy peaches then for 25 to 50 cents a bushel. The women complained of the trouble they had tightening the lids on the jars."

Adams worked out his clamp idea at the shop where he worked. The clamp sold for 25 cents.

The union was only 15 years old when Adams joined and Henry Garrett, one of the union's founders, was still active in Lodge 1. Adams recalls that "Garrett would get up at every meeting to urge more organizing. He always made a powerful impression on his hearers."

During his 50 years as financial secretary for Lodge 555, Adams has known every IAM General Secretary-Treasurer since George Preston, the union's second.

Learn the 'keeping quality' before freezing fish catch

By Charles Covell

Closing your fishing season with a freezer full of fish?

If you are, it would be wise to keep in mind that fish vary greatly in keeping qualities, just as they are different in flavor, texture and amount of meat per pound.

A largemouth bass, for example, yields slightly more protein than other favorite game fish, yet would hardly be a buy at the fish market. Less than half its weight is usable meat.

In a lake trout, nearly 80 percent of the meat is edible. Unfortunately, its 9 per cent fat content makes it unsuitable for freezing for long periods.

Bass, walleye, yellow perch and bluegill all possess low fat content, so you can freeze them without losing flavor.

The same goes for salt water fish. Striped bass, unlike the fresh water bass which are not really bass at all but belong to the sunfish family, have a high fat content and do not keep more than 60 days in a freezer without acquiring a rancid taste. This is also true of any fish of the mackerel family. The higher the oil or fat content, the sooner it has to be eaten.

Flounder or sole, on the other hand, along with ocean perch, haddock, codfish, snappers, groupers and others of their families can be kept for longer periods.

Therefore, it might be wise to make an inventory now and if your fish threaten to go beyond the trouble zone before they can be eaten, share some with the neighbors.

Incidentally, if you are in an area favored with soft clams, they can be washed and frozen in the shell. Don't try to keep them more than 30 days, but in the meantime they are as delicious steamed as when they were dug. Hard clams may be steamed open, the flesh packed in plastic containers and frozen as the basis for clam chowders. They keep quite well.

Perhaps you haven't ended your fishing season. Unless you live in the northwest where blizzards have already set in, you are wise.

It's true that on a day-by-day basis, good weather worsens in the fall rather than improves as it does in spring, but until freezing sets in, the fishing gets better.

The appetites of fish in the lakes and streams, particularly the usually wily bass and pickerel, pick up as cool weather arrives.

Until the morning frost fails to melt with the rising sun and surface waters become a sheet of ice, most game fish continue to roam their feeding grounds.

Between now and then they are susceptible to the offerings of fishermen who have the savvy to fish for them and the willingness to brave the brisk breezes.

Why We Are in Politics

By James L. McDevitt
National Director of COPE
(Reprinted from IUD Digest)

Future elections will mark another test of strength for the Committee on Political Education (COPE) in the field of politics.

Before the battle gets too intense—and there is certainly every indication that it will be intense—it might perhaps be useful to examine again our fundamental premises. Why are we as a trade union movement engaged in politics? What do we hope to achieve by our participation?

I am convinced that too many of our members do not yet fully know the answers to these questions. I am equally convinced that when they do understand "why," many of our problems will be on their way to solution.

Today's world is an infinitely complex place.

We may yearn for the days when San Francisco was a long way from the east coast, when a flight from New York to Paris was an epoch-making event, when Amos and Andy ruled the air waves and people could only listen to, not see, the world's great events, when highways were uncluttered and a 250 mile auto trip was a big undertaking, when groceries were sold by a clerk and you talked to the butcher about the cut of meat you wanted, when local problems were local problems and when the editor of the Podunk Gazette could claim that "if it didn't happen in Podunk it didn't happen."

Realistically we know those days don't exist any more—and our memories cloud over the dark spots. Those, too, were the days of the 10 and 12 hour day, of small and weak labor organizations, of professional strikebreakers and Harry Bennett's "service" squads, of waves of unemployment, of bonus marchers, of cynical and corrupt political bosses ruling our local, state and sometimes national governments, and of domination of our national life by big business.

As the world has grown more complex the role of government has become more important and the responsibilities of the governed have grown.

As a simple illustration, in 1930 approximately 3.7 million individuals filed federal income tax returns. In 1953 over 57 million individual federal income tax returns were filed.

In 1930 there was no federal old age retirement program. Last month the Department of Health, Education and Welfare mailed out almost eight million checks to retirees under the Social Security Act. Next month they will mail out about the same number. Each month the Railroad Retirement Board mails out about 456,000 checks while the Veteran's Administration carries about 2.8 million people on its rolls as beneficiaries.

In 1930, when a man was thrown out of work—and many of them were in that year—his only means of feeding his family and keeping a roof over their heads were his own resources and handouts from charity. Today the average unemployment compensation payment is $29 a week —not enough, certainly, to maintain a decent standard of living but certainly better than the 1930 scale.

Governmental Role

Today we are concerned with the direction our economy is taking. Economists tell us it is going down at an unpleasantly rapid rate. They also tell us that were it not for various federal programs it would be going down at an even more rapid rate.

To the economists this is a matter of academic concern. To the building tradesman on the construction site or the factory worker in the plant it is a matter of bread and butter, clothes and shelter for himself and his family. It means the difference between meeting payments on his car or arguing with the repossessor, between meeting payments on the television set or watching it being toted out of the house.

What government policy is and what it will be in the next few months will hit each of us in the bread basket whether we like it or not. We may agree or disagree with the theory that government should or should not exercise control over economic policy, that it should be left to the businessmen. Whatever theory we hold, the inescapable fact of life today is that government does determine economic policy and thereby the amount of food in the family pot.

Nor is government some vague group of people called "they." It is composed of men and women elected to public office for specified periods of time by each citizen. It is either Adlai Stevenson or Dwight D. Eisenhower, Senator X or Senator Y, Representative A or Representative B, as we may choose at election time. We prosper or struggle depending upon their wisdom, foresight, prejudices, and capacity.

Sometimes I am told this is not so, that through our trade unions we can set rates and determine conditions that will affect the lives of our members and that is the limit of our responsibility as trade unionists.

It may be—although I doubt it—that there was a day when this was so but it is emphatically not so today. The trade union movement is composed of 16 million members in a sea of over 170 million people in the United States and more than two billion people in the world. We cannot live our lives apart from them, insulated and isolated in a world alone. To fulfill our responsibility as trade unionists we must recognize this fact.

More Than Economics

It is not only in the field of economic policy that government touches our lives. There is, as a matter of fact, scarcely a single human activity that is not influenced to some degree by government.

You get up in the morning, turn on the lights and turn on the radio. The rates you pay for electricity are set by a governmental commission. The station that broadcasts your morning program receives its license from a governmental commission.

Perhaps you have bacon and eggs for breakfast. Your bacon has been inspected by a governmental inspector and your eggs have, no doubt, been produced by chickens whose care and feeding has been suggested by research scientists of the Department of Agriculture.

You may take a street car or bus to work. The fares have been approved by a governmental commission. You read a newspaper in which, chances are, most of the stories are about the actions of the police department the night before or the fire department or the city council or your state and national government.

The place in which you work, most likely, has been licensed to operate. It has been inspected for certain safety conditions. Your employer has to keep certain records. He must deduct your income tax and your social security tax.

While you are at work your children are in school, being taught at the expense of the taxpayers. The shopping your wife does at the grocery store is protected by food and drug laws and you're pretty sure the weights and measures your grocer uses are honest.

At night you may catch a ride home with a neighbor. He is licensed to drive by a governmental agency and he obeys the traffic laws established by the city government.

Your television show in the evening is broadcast by a station licensed to do business and the very set itself must conform to certain safety standards to insure that it will not electrocute you as you turn it on or off.

At night you climb into bed. Your mattress has a tag on it that certifies its contents have been inspected. As you sleep, policemen are patrolling the streets and firemen are standing by in case you need them. The streets are being cleaned, trash is being collected, in accordance with the rules and regulations you, acting through your government, have established.

Perhaps this is a bleak picture. This is not the way we like to think of ourselves — protected, coddled, surrounded by rules and regulations. Yet we are not restricted or coddled, because these are rules and regulations we have imposed upon ourselves to insure the orderly operation of our society. Imagine, for instance, a city in which there were no traffic lights, no traffic regulations, no restrictions on drivers. It might work if everybody walked.

And I have only scratched the surface. Workmen's compensation laws, housing programs, fair labor standards, child labor laws, public assistance, education, agriculture, public health—all these and many others are activities of our government which we, as voters and as taxpayers, direct and control.

Why Politics

Granting that this is so, why, I am sometimes asked, is it necessary for our trade unions to engage in this activity? Why can't we engage in this activity in our individual capacities?

We can, of course, engage in the processes of government as individual voters but the curious thing is that the more involved people get in politics and government the more clearly they see the importance of acting together. Acting individually they can do something. Acting together they can do much more.

As Theodore Roosevelt once put it, "when a band of 150 or 200 honest, intelligent men, who mean business and know their business, is found in any district, whether in one of the local organizations or outside, you can guarantee that the local politicians of that district will begin to treat it with a combination of fear, hatred, and respect and that its influence will be felt."

Our trade unions are instruments we have devised for improving the welfare of our members. When so much of the welfare of our members is determined in the field of politics and government it is impossible for us, as trade unionists, to ignore it. Having recognized the necessity of action in this sphere it would be equally impossible for us to forget everything we know about organization and acting together when we enter the political arena.

There are those who say we should confine ourselves to legislative activities, that we should make our representations to members of Congress and members of the government and leave the rest to the members' own instincts.

Certainly our legislative activities are vital and the legislative department of the AFL-CIO does yeoman service on legislative matters in which the trade union movement is interested. Yet I feel sure it would be the first to say that politicians do not always act entirely on principle.

The politician knows, probably better than anyone else, who is a registered voter in his district and who is not. He knows where his support is coming from and where he may receive opposition. His judgment is guided, and properly so, by such factors, for his job is to satisfy and represent the people of his district. The only knowledge he has of their wishes is the knowledge he receives at the ballot box on election day and his ear is tuned to the pulling of the voting levers.

COPE seeks to help the member of Congress and the member of government know the wishes of his constituents and it seeks, likewise, to help the constituents know something about their representative.

Our Congress, unlike most parliamentary bodies in the world, provides for a daily printed verbatim record of its proceedings. It prints, except in cases in which the national security would be affected, the verbatim record of hearings before its committees. It records by name the vote of each individual Representative and Senator on roll calls, no matter how trivial.

Its intent, clearly, is that voters should know what Congress is doing.

The intent is admirable. Unfortunately the Congressional Record is a bulky document and the hearings before committees run to many pages. Decisive roll call votes, because of parliamentary procedure, are often hidden in technical quagmires.

To help constituents understand what is going on in Congress COPE undertakes to sift through the Congressional Record and the committee hearings, to interpret the significance of roll calls, and to analyze the meaning of governmental actions and decisions.

Having done this it then seeks to see to it that voters, particularly those in the trade union movement, receive this information and are prepared to act upon it in an effective way.

The only effective way of acting is obviously through politics and the only effective politics is organization. We come, therefore, to the organization of state and local COPE's, to registration drives, to drives for individual voluntary contributions with which to finance expenditures in connection with federal elections.

And even if all of what I have said here is unconvincing there still remains a compelling reason for our participation in politics. It is the fact that our opponents in the economic field are actively engaged in politics. They are actively seeking the passage of legislation that will benefit them when it comes to bargaining collectively and when it comes to the distribution of the products of our labor.

The record of Congress and of the state legislatures is full to overflowing with attempts to restrict the rights of our trade unions, with attempts to get the tax burden shifted to the shoulders of working people, with attempts to exploit natural resources for the benefit of a few, with attempts to narrow the scope of our social security and wage standards laws, with attempts to direct our government toward the interest of the few and against the many.

Our Political Commitment

The simple fact is that it was the Smith-Connally Act of 1943 and its successor, the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947, that compelled the present day labor movement to enter into politics. Were it not for those two pieces of punitive legislation it is possible that we would not today be exerting the efforts we are in the political field. Equally, if we were not today exerting the effort we are it is certain that Taft-Hartley and Smith-Connally would be weak tea compared to the brew that would be set before us.

The commitment to politics is one we cannot escape if we are to survive and if we are to serve our members. Having made it, as trade unionists we cannot escape the obligation to devote our utmost efforts to it.

We are making progress. Considering the length of time we have been active in this area I think we have made very good progress. But the challenge is always before us. The pressure is always on and the perils of failure are great.

In the future, we will be engaged in other contests. I am sure that, given the help and support of our members, we will make a creditable showing. But it will take more than good intentions. It will require the active and interested support of each of us. No one can afford to sit on the sidelines.

Jack Johnson, the great Negro heavyweight, put his finger on it back in 1915 when he was fighting Jess Willard under Havana's blazing summer sun. A spectator at the ringside kept up a running fire of abuse. He criticized Johnson's style, made cracks about his color, complained about his ancestry and belittled his courage in the ring.

Finally, between rounds, Johnson leaned over the ropes, smiled down at the man and said: "Man, you're down there talking. I'm up here fighting."

In the effort in which we are engaged none of us can afford to be "down there talking." All of us, at least part of the time, have to be "up here fighting."

Strip Mining

Stripping means fast profit, ruined land

By JEANNE M. RASMUSSEN

Clifton Bryant, a retired coal miner, has spent "the last 41 years" building and improving his small, cinderblock and wood home in Dry Branch, West Virginia.

Today, he sweeps the snow from his hand-laid brick walkway and points a sun-leathered hand toward the once-beautiful hills that surround him.

The lush greenery of spring, the hills aflame with yellows and reds in the fall, the little squirrels hunting acorns for the winter—are all gone. In their place are huge, gaping holes and ruts gouged out of God's land, leaving pock-marked and scarred devastation where nature once thrived.

The snaking path of the strippers moves closer each day and Bryant remarks that he is old and tired of fighting.

"But who will be left to bury the dead," he murmurs. "Don't they realize when man destroys his environment, he's also destroying himself?"

Bryant is not alone.

All over West Virginia, Kentucky, Ohio and elsewhere, miners and other citizens must suffer as reckless coal operators murder their mountains, streams, trees and wildlife as well as homes and personal property.

The price of coal has soared to more than twice what it was a year ago in some cases and, seeing an opportunity to grab quick profits regardless of the destruction of the environment, ruthless coal operators are accelerating their stripping operations.

A survey of strip mine permits issued in the Appalachian coal states revealed that in West Virginia, Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee nearly 50 per cent of the strip mining permits now in force have been issued in the last seven months.

The tearing, chewing, wrenching machines now work at an accelerated speed to extract "black gold" from the hillsides seeking a chance to make quick profits. In West Virginia alone, strippers were granted permits to gouge twice as many acres in 1970 as they did in 1969—31,802 acres in 1970 compared with 15,710 in 1969.

Hanna Coal Division of Consolidation Coal Co., owns 95,000 acres of strip mine lands in Belmont and Harrison counties of Ohio. It's largest operation is in the "Egypt Valley" field which straddles Interstate 70 between Wheeling, W.Va. and Columbus, Ohio.

Here, Hanna operates the "Gem of Egypt" ("Gem" stands for "giant earth mover"), one of two 100-foot-high, 10,000 norsepower electric shovels that scoop up the earth in 200-ton buckets. According to Ben Franklin of the New York TIMES, the mine has nearly obliterated the township of Kirkwood."

James Wilkinson of Kingwood Mining Co., located in Preston County, W.Va., has announced that a smaller version of the "Gem" will soon be in operation at Kingwood, giving the company the "distinction" of becoming the "largest strip operation in the state." (Ironically, the name of the town of Kingwood was selected because of the location there of a stand of unusually tall trees—forest king, i.e., "king wood.")

As the destruction and human misery caused by strip mining accelerates, there are some hopeful signs.

In the West Virginia Legislature, Kanawha County Democrat Si Galperin has introduced a bill calling for strip mining to be abolished by January 1. 1973.

As the Miner's Voice went to press, this bill was being studied in a committee.

While the pro-stripping forces appear formidable (spending an estimated $100,000 on advertising alone), support for the bill has come from many quarters. Among the most prominent of those supporters is Sec. of State John D. Rockefeller IV; State senator Robert Holliday of Fayette County; Delegate Warren McGraw (D-Wyoming); Rev. Richard C. Austin (a Presbyterian minister who directs the Charleston-based Citizens to Abolish Strip Mining), and various ecological groups and organizations, as well as individuals such as Ellis Bailey of Clear Fork (Raleigh County) who have personally become the victims of a vicious and irresponsible industry.

Even as battle lines are forming in the marbled halls of the West Virginia state capitol following the introduction of the Galperin anti-stripping bill, the Image-makers continue to assault gullible tourists with "Wild, Wonderful West Virginia" slogans, and runaway sons and daughters are urged to return to the "sparkling streams and lush forests" of the hinterland for "Homecoming '71."

"Love it or Leave it" has indeed become a serious issue in West Virginia—for the price of "Progress" (called strip mining) provides profit for a few at the expense of many. If strip mining cannot be abolished within a reasonable period of time, then both concerned and unconcerned West Virginians will be left to contemplate at leisure the scarred, gouged-out mountains, skinned slopes, polluted streams and butchered forests.

An 82-year old West Virginia coal miner recalls:

"The 'Speculators' brought an end to the land and its resources, and the end of the freedom-loving mountaineer.

"These speculators walked easy with the mountaineers for a while, and those who had sold their land enjoyed the little money they received for it. They'd tell other mountaineers that they'd 'sold' their land and were still enjoying the benefits from it—same as always . . . like eating the cake and keeping it too.

"That was just the beginning. Vast boundaries of coal had been discovered and the speculators began to organize companies to mine the coal. They went at it like the Buffalo hunters in the plains states that would shoot the Buffalo for the hide only and leave the carcass to rot.. The [speculators] didn't shoot Buffalo, but what they did was worse. They monopolized all the land, butchered up the best timber, and then they went for the coal.

"These coal companies were greedy, money-hungry. They wanted coal cheap and fast so they could pile up profits quickly. They graded roads through fields, dumped slate on farm lands, tore down barns and sometimes dwellings, undermined springs and wells—causing them to sink their water—and leaving mountaineer families with water unfit to use.

"There was nothing the mountaineer could do, because the document he had signed showed that he had either sold his land outright, or the company had retained the 'mineral rights,' which meant the right to operate as they saw fit.

"Bewildered mountaineers began to see they had sold their birthright for a mess of pottage."

But the "glib-talking speculators" of yesteryear have been replaced by highly-paid public relations firms engaged by the ultra-rich coal industrialists of today. Full-page newspaper ads extolling the virtues of strip mining, the wonders of 'reclamation,' and the 'contribution to the state's economy,' blind the eyes of readers searching for factual news. The "Pro-stripping" campaign swings into high gear in West Virginia, and the Surface Mine Association wails about the number of jobs to be lost; the families subjected to hunger or starvation; the corner grocery-store operator who would lose business.

To prove their point, the operators bussed approximately 2000 strip mine workers, wives, kids, heavy equipment operators and manufacturers, insurers and assorted others into the West Virginia state capitol two weeks ago for a wall-to-wall extravaganza which appeared to be aimed primarily aimed at Secretary of State Jay Rockefeller, who has called for the abolition of strip mining.

Carrying commercially printed placards (without union label), the insurgents gleefully waved signs reading:

IMPORT JOBS, EXPORT ROCKEFELLER

THIS IS OUR STATE. WE BELONG HERE, ROCKEFELLER DOES NOT. WE NEED OUR STRIP MINES.

A couple of company helicopters with streamers hovered over the gilded dome of the Capitol Building. (It appeared to be a one-day stand, however, and when the shouting was over, thousands of picket-signs were junked in garbage cans. A few still littered legislative hallways.)

The money source behind this ostentatious display of opposition was vague, but one strip miner's wife related that it was furnished by "UMWA locals and a few coal operators." Others, however, staunchly maintained that their efforts were "voluntary."

An equipment operator for the Cedar Coal Company warned that "a strike in 29 states would be the outcome of a ban on strip mining, with deep miners coming to the support of 'union brothers.' " (Records obtained by a member of the West Virginia Black Lung Assn. show that prior to January 1971 Cedar Coal Co. was NON-UNION. The present status seems to be the same.)

Earl Howell, an appointed UMWA Secretary-Treasurer of District 17, Charleston, W.Va., was quoted by a local GAZETTE writer as saying that the union "isn't in favor of closing down the mines . . . but," he added confidently, the delegates will realize that we just can't turn our backs on an entire industry."

(Just as UMWA officials worked diligently two years ago behind the scenes for the passage of a watered-down black lung bill, they have once again been observed hand-holding with the operators. Their pseudo-concern for strip-miners' job security seems as phony as their belated band-wagon stand for underground coal miners' health and safety. If the anti-strip mine bill is defeated, watch them pat themselves on the back!)

Many underground miners, members of the UMW, have angrily expressed resentment at the union's so-called "representation." Basically, they feel that "strip-miners" are another 'breed of cat' and should not be entitled to union (UMWA) membership or given voting privileges to determine matters relating to underground health and safety problems.

"When John L. Lewis automated underground mines some 20 years ago, where was all the concern for the thousands of men replaced by machinery?" one disabled coal miner said. "I can tell you—it was no where to be found!"

George Joy Titler, the aged, obese vice-president of the UMWA, seized the opportunity to again use his "poison pen" writing skill to take issue with personalities, rather than issues. Titler, who has recently moved back to his impressively landscaped mansion in Beckley (where visions of strip-mined hills are as remote a possibility as Big George giving up his lifetime UMWA pension), wrote West Virginia legislators that they were "being sold a gold brick on strip mining by your august and benevolent Secretary of State John D. Rockefeller IV, who is trying to outlaw strip mines in West Virginia."

Claiming that Jay Rockefeller should "crusade" in Indiana—"where the Standard Oil Company has two large "strip mines," Titler charged that Rockefeller was "depriving 7000 families of their livelihood in West Virginia—while tearing the hell out of the prairie in Indiana with these mammoth dirt movers.

Unemployment, of course, is a realistic problem in West Virginia and one that should not be regarded lightly.

Mrs. Noel Snuffer of Raleigh County, a member of "Citizens to Abolish Strip Mining" replies:

"There has been a lot of hollering about job loss. Of course, no one wants to lose their jobs, but what about two years from now as pollution of the water and erosion of the land continues. What kind of future will our children have?

"The coal companies are making a lot of poor people out of this wealthy state of ours; just look around and you can see substandard education, the worst roads in the country, and the poor people being taxed to death."

And Arnold Miller of Ohley, W.Va. (Kanawha Co.), Treasurer of the West Virginia Black Lung Association, is skeptical about the trauma of job loss:

"These workers are predominantly from out of state," he says, "They are skilled heavy equipment operators who would have no trouble finding work. . . ."

Even the strongest members of abolition groups do not advocate the philosophy that a man's job be taken and his family be left to welfare; but they argue logically that the Galperin bill is not a 'cut off," but a 'phase out' over a two-year period, with retraining programs offered to those displaced miners who might have difficulty securing other jobs. Despite all the arguments of the industry, they maintain that strip mining is simply a short-term investment for operators and a long-term mortgage for residents of West Virginia.

John Pate owns 104 acres of land on Little Big Creek.

"I own the land," he explains, "but it specifies in the deed that I cannot strip. I don't own the mineral rights—and I'm an individual and not a company. Everybody's yelling about 'property rights.' Well, if the damn strip operators can do whatever they please on their land, why don't I have the same rights?

"These deeds were written way back in the idiotic days when the company prospectors went around and bought 'mineral rights' for 50 cents or $1.50 an acre. It was the most unconstitutional, unscrupulous thing ever devised! Right now, they can come in on my property, drill for oil and gas, and never be liable for damages.

"It's one helluva' thing," Pate concluded. "Property owners in West Virginia pay taxes to protect the rights of operators!"

Members of the West Virginia legislature, at this point, appear to be leaning toward the conservative viewpoint—stricter regulations but no total abolishment.

Del. Howard Chambers (D-Mingo), who once owned a strip mine in Virginia, explained to a youthful conservationist why he didn't think 'abolition' was necessary:

"Well, I may not even be here, twenty years from now," Chambers rationalized.

Meanwhile, Mrs. William Strange, president of the Surface Miners Auxiliary, polished off a press interview with the statement:

"We are not polluting the state to the extent of exploitation."

The inevitable consequence of such reasoning is that it may someday come back to haunt us all. The "promise" of a 1967 reclamation law in West Virginia that failed, has been blatantly excused as "Past History," and strip mine operators now insist their intentions are "sincere."

But Ellis Bailey of Clear Fork, W.Va. (who had the starring role in the film documentary BEFORE THE MOUNTAIN WAS MOVED), moves slowly (he's crippled by arthritis and black lung) and speaks sadly of mountains where he once hunted squirrel and 'coon; and of streams, which now bleed the rusty color of mine acids. He agonizes personally over each tree that's been stripped of bark or knocked down the hillside, and his faith in the "sincerity" of strippers is non-existent.

"They can't put it back," Bailey says bitterly, "They never can put it back again like it was before . . ." And even though Bailey has forgotten his teeth again, his words ring true, and the depth of his emotion is totally understandable.

Bitter Miners Assert The 'Black Lung' Law Is Filled With Loopholes

Disabled Men Say Benefits Are Difficult to Collect; 'Slipshod' Diagnoses Cited

'Our Only Weapon: A Strike'

By ~~Bob Harwood~~
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

BECKLEY, W.Va.—~~Peter Bob Gibson~~, a 67-year-old ex-coal miner, steps onto the treadmill. Blood-sampling needles protrude from his left arm. A rubber mouthpiece and tube connect his respiratory system to a bank of testing devices, while electrodes taped to his chest monitor his heartbeat.

Slight, pale and stooped, Mr. Gibson is obviously tired as he begins a six-minute walk on the treadmill. The testing devices are measuring his ability to breathe and the capacity of his lungs for transferring oxygen to the bloodstream. He is going through two days of tests here at the Appalachian Regional Hospital to find out exactly what 31 years in the coal mines have done to his body.

Mr. Gibson, a resident of Rainelle, W.Va., was forced to retire earlier this year after a stroke. He now complains of constant fatigue and shortness of breath. He contends these maladies are caused by a lung disease named pneumoconiosis, more commonly called "black lung," which is an occupational hazard of work in dusty coal mines. But the federal government has told Mr. Gibson he doesn't have a black lung disability—and, through medical tests, Mr. Gibson is determined to prove the government wrong.

Mr. Gibson isn't alone. In fact, he's one of thousands of coal miners who have lost faith in a program they initially thought was a major legislative victory for the country's underground coal workers. The victory they had hailed was the passage of the Federal Coal Mine Health and Safety Act, signed by President Nixon on Dec. 31, 1969. Besides setting mine-safety standards, the act established a black lung compensation program providing cash benefits ranging from $153 to $306 a month for miners who are disabled by pneumoconiosis resulting from their work and for widows of miners who died of the disease.

Bitterness and Frustration

On paper the legislation seemed to be a major advancement for the miners. But initial joy in many cases turned to bitterness and frustration. More than half of almost 300,000 miners who have applied for black lung benefits have been rejected by the Social Security Administration, which has the responsibility under the act for deciding, case by case, which miners meet its requirement of total disability stemming from mine-contracted pneumoconiosis. Social Security statistics show that through Sept. 3 of this year, 145,428 claims for benefits have been allowed, while 147,761 have been rejected.

Indeed, the black lung program has proven far more complicated and controversial than

and a "blood-gas" test, which measures the amount of oxygen absorbed by the blood.

A group of 12 disabled Kentucky miners, aided by a local legal-aid organization, has filed suit in federal district court in Washington, D.C., seeking to eliminate altogether the use of the X ray in determining whether a benefit claimant has black lung. The 12 miners claim to be totally disabled by the disease but have had their benefit claims rejected either because their X rays didn't show spots on the lung or, if they did show spots, a subsequent breathing test ordered by Social Security officials disqualified them.

Some of the plaintiffs claim their examinations were inadequate. Ray Hubbard, a 39-year-old ex-miner from Manchester, Ky., says "a nurse took one picture and I never saw a doctor" during his test at a local hospital. Mr. Hubbard says he's disabled and out of work because of heart trouble and lung impairment; but his black lung claim, he says, was rejected on the basis of that one X ray and one quick breathing test.

Dr. Donald Rasmussen, director of the cardiopulmonary laboratory at the Appalachian Regional Hospital in Beckley, backs up the suing miners. "Many, many miners have been unjustly deprived of compensation," the doctor says. "The Social Security Administration has employed only the simplest and least costly testing procedures in its approach to this complicated problem."

A Call for More Thorough Tests

A second court test, backed up by other medical authorities, is being prepared by the Appalachian Research and Defense Fund, a private, nonprofit lawyers' group in Charleston, W.Va. The evidence for this group's case was gathered by 12 doctors from medical schools and in private practice around the country who recently examined about 30 black lung rejectees in Beckley. Following their examinations, the doctors issued a public statement calling the Social Security testing "unduly and unnecessarily restrictive" and recommending more thorough diagnostic efforts, including blood-gas tests.

One of the dozen physicians is Dr. John Rankin, chairman of the department of preventive medicine at the University of Wisconsin. Dr. Rankin says the breathing test used by Social Security only measures the ability of an individual to breathe air in and out—while black lung interferes with the lung's ability to transfer oxygen to the blood. "A man can have a perfectly normal breathing test and be severely disabled," the doctor says. A blood-gas test, however, detects impairments such as black lung.

Another doctor in the group says that rejections based on the current Social Security tests "should offend us all as doctors." He adds: "The denial of benefits to men too short of breath to walk half a flight of stairs should offend us all as citizens."

On the congressional front, the black lung controversy is spurring an amendment to the 1969 act. The House Labor Committee has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. Carl D. Perkins of Kentucky that would prohibit rejection of claims solely on the basis of chest X rays and would extend for two years the federal administration and financing of the black lung program.

The full House is scheduled to vote on the amendment next week. Passage is considered likely, since little opposition to the change has appeared. Indeed, coal industry interests would welcome a two-year reprieve from shouldering the black lung cost burden. The cost is no small matter. The benefits paid thus far exceed $400 million and are currently running at a monthly rate of more than $25 million.

Keeping the Heat On

In the coalfields, the Black Lung Association and its allies are campaigning to keep the heat on the government to improve the medical screening of claimants. "Our goal isn't to see that everyone who files a claim gets paid, but that they get proper consideration," says the association's Mr. Miller.

Mr. Miller's group is widely distributing in mining areas a "how-to-fight-the-establishment" cartoon booklet titled, "Black Lung Bill Battles Social Security." Featuring heavy-handed caricatures (one drawing depicts President Nixon and a coal company man, hand in hand, standing on a pile of downtrodden miners), the booklet advises miners what evidence is needed to prove black lung, how to appeal a rejected claim and how to "play the Social Security game."

Significantly, the United Mine Workers union isn't playing an important activist role in the black lung controversy. The union hasn't joined in the Kentucky miners' suit or aided in the gathering of evidence to back those fighting the Social Security. In fact, the black lung battlers are generally allied with the dissident factions in the union who are at odds with their president, W. A. "Tony" Boyle, and his administration. Mr. Miller charges the union "isn't concerned" with the black lung controversy.

A spokesman for the Mine Workers responds that the union has supported black lung compensation since the early 1950s and, since the passage of the law, has established counselors in each of its district offices to aid miners in filing claims. The spokesman, however, concedes the union won't have anything to do with the anti-Boyle black lung battlers.

Social Security Administration officials also defend their role—although they admit there's room for improvement. To complaints about testing procedures, Mr. Popick counters that "there's a small minority (of doctors) who question the use of the X ray but the predominant medical opinion is that without an X ray you can't prove total disability."

No Basic Disagreement

Mr. Popick adds that he has "no basic disagreement" with critics who say that more thorough testing methods should be utilized and that more medical examining facilities should be made available to miners. But he says that tests other than the X ray and the simple breathing test currently being used "take sophisticated knowledge, techniques and equipment" that aren't widely available in mining regions for the processing of large numbers of black lung claims.

Mr. Popick further reports that Social Security and the Public Health Service are jointly starting a new pilot program "which will test a few hundred miners whose applications have been denied" to determine what other tests might be used in the future.

Still, Mr. Popick contends, the Social Security Administration is administering the law as passed by Congress. He further asserts that many of the agency's difficulties, and the resulting controversy, stem from "misinformation." For example, he says, miners with disabling diseases other than pneumoconiosis—including emphysema, asthma and bronchitis—that may have been aggravated by work in the mines are nevertheless ineligible for black lung benefits.

"It's difficult for a man to understand that he can be totally disabled but not by pneumoconiosis and thus not receive benefits," Mr. Popick says. And, reflecting on the black lung program's many problems, he adds: "We don't have the final answer by a long shot."

Nor does Peter Bob Gibson have his final answer from his tests at the Appalachian Regional Hospital. He, and others like him, continue to wait and hope, ironically, that their diagnostic results will indicate the presence of black lung disease.

ment has told Mr. Gibson he doesn't have a black lung disability—and, through medical tests, Mr. Gibson is determined to prove the government wrong.

Mr. Gibson isn't alone. In fact, he's one of thousands of coal miners who have lost faith in a program they initially thought was a major legislative victory for the country's underground coal workers. The victory they had hailed was the passage of the Federal Coal Mine Health and Safety Act, signed by President Nixon on Dec. 31, 1969. Besides setting mine-safety standards, the act established a black lung compensation program providing cash benefits ranging from $153 to $306 a month for miners who are disabled by pneumoconiosis resulting from their work and for widows of miners who died of the disease.

Bitterness and Frustration

On paper the legislation seemed to be a major advancement for the miners. But initial joy in many cases turned to bitterness and frustration. More than half of almost 300,000 miners who have applied for black lung benefits have been rejected by the Social Security Administration, which has the responsibility under the act for deciding, case by case, which miners meet its requirement of total disability stemming from mine-contracted pneumoconiosis. Social Security statistics show that through Sept. 3 of this year, 145,428 claims for benefits have been allowed, while 147,761 have been rejected.

Indeed, the black lung program has proven far more complicated and controversial than anyone imagined in 1969. As the miners' disillusionment with the program has deepened, the controversy has led to a campaign in the coalfields, the Congress and the courts to change the program. And there are rumbles of "black lung" strikes if the change doesn't come.

"It may take a shutdown of production to get fair black lung benefits," warns Arnold Miller, a retired miner from Ohley, W.Va., who is now president of the Black Lung Association, a miners' group formed to lobby for such benefits. Strikes, Mr. Miller adds, are "the only real weapon" miners have.

The outcry over the Social Security Administration's black lung rejections has been particularly loud in West Virginia and Kentucky, due to a noticeable disparity in the rejection rate from state to state. In Kentucky, 68% of 31,694 miners' claims have been turned down; in West Virginia, 54% of the state's 55,549 claimants have been rejected. But, in sharp contrast, some 70% of the 93,854 claims processed in Pennsylvania have been approved.

Difficult to Detect

Unhappy miners charge that the rejection-rate disparity isn't caused by chance. Pneumoconiosis is a difficult disease to detect, and the miners claim there aren't enough qualified doctors and properly equipped medical facilities in the isolated mountain regions of Kentucky and West Virginia to permit thorough medical examinations.

The miners further charge that doctors in these mountain regions are often influenced by the views of the coal industry—which stands to inherit a large financial liability when the financing of black lung benefits reverts to state administration. (The program will be federally financed at least until Jan. 1, 1973. When the states take over the program, the coal companies will pay costs either through direct assessments or through state workmen's compensation systems.)

Social Security officials say there are other reasons for the disparity. Bernard Popick, director of the Bureau of Disability Insurance, says the Pennsylvania claimants were, on average, "significantly older" with a longer exposure to coal dust than claimants in the other states. He adds, furthermore, that black lung is more prevalent among anthracite (hard) coal miners than among bituminous (soft) coal miners, and Pennsylvania still has thousands of retired workers from the once-large but now-dying anthracite industry.

The real battle, however, isn't over state-by-state differences but over methods of testing for the disease. Disgruntled miners contend that the Social Security Administration is rejecting claims on the basis of insufficient and even slipshod diagnoses. And to back up their contention, the miners have marshaled an impressive corps of lung specialists.

The crux of the controversy is the government's reliance on X rays as the primary basis for accepting or rejecting a claim. The miners' groups and their supporting medical authorities contend that a single X ray and a simple accompanying breathing test aren't sufficient to prove the absence of black lung. Instead, some miners recommend a series of X rays blood-gas tests.

One of the dozen physicians is Dr. John Rankin, chairman of the department of preventive medicine at the University of Wisconsin. On the congressional front, the black lung controversy is spurring an amendment to the 1969 act. The House Labor Committee has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. Carl D. Perkins of Kentucky that would prohibit rejection of claims solely on the basis of chest X rays and would extend for two years the federal administration and financing of the black lung program.

The full House is scheduled to vote on the amendment next week. Passage is considered likely, since little opposition to the change has appeared. Indeed, coal industry interests would welcome a two-year reprieve from shouldering the black lung cost burden. The cost is no "take sophisticated knowledge, techniques and equipment" that aren't widely available in mining regions for the processing of large numbers of black lung claims.

Mr. Popick further reports that Social Security and the Public Health Service are jointly starting a new pilot program "which will test a few hundred miners whose applications have been denied" to determine what other tests might be used in the future.

Still, Mr. Popick contends, the Social Security Administration is administering the law as passed by Congress. He further asserts that many of the agency's difficulties, and the resulting controversy, stem from "misinformation." For example, he says, miners with disabling diseases other than pneumoconiosis—including emphysema, asthma and bronchitis—that may have been aggravated by work in the mines are nevertheless ineligible for black lung benefits.

"It's difficult for a man to understand that he can be totally disabled but not by pneumoconiosis and thus not receive benefits," Mr. Popick says. And, reflecting on the black lung program's many problems, he adds: "We don't have the final answer by a long shot."

Nor does Peter Bob Gibson have his final answer from his tests at the Appalachian Regional Hospital. He, and others like him, continue to wait and hope, ironically, that their diagnostic results will indicate the presence of black lung disease.

Getting Off Lightly

Coal-Safety Violators Get Bargain-Rate Fines From Bureau of Mines

Earlier Guidelines Ignored In Penalties for Violations Endangering Miners' Lives

An Elusive, Informal Policy

7/28/71

By BURT SCHORR
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON—Island Creek Coal Co., the nation's No. 3 coal producer, has recently drawn 30-odd government citations for unsafe mine conditions said to threaten immediate injury or death to miners.

According to guidelines published by the Interior Department in January, the usual penalty for each such safety violation should be between $5,000 and $10,000. But assessors in the department's Bureau of Mines have actually proposed penalties (subject to change on appeal to higher authority) of only $2,000 each. Thus Island Creek stands to save some $90,000.

The assessors were faithfully following an unpublicized policy established by Edward D. Failor, the Nixon administration's man in charge of mine safety penalties; Mr. Failor is a former Iowa municipal judge and public relations man for Republican congressional candidates. Under his policy, mine owners are being assessed at a bargain rate well below the published version for "imminent hazard" withdrawal orders—the most serious of several types of orders requiring withdrawal of miners from the pits.

Penalties proposed in less serious cases have been pegged at the published minimum. And, on Mr. Failor's instructions, Bureau of Mines assessors have refrained from raising the penalty for mines where these types of withdrawal orders have been issued again and again.

A few weeks ago, in accusing the bureau of laggard safety enforcement, Congress' General Accounting Office cited a failure to "assess sufficiently large penalties" in order to induce "mine operators to take the necessary actions to insure full compliance" with the Coal Mine Health and Safety Act of 1969.

How Tough? Nobody Knows

Singed by such criticism, bureau officials have been warning the coal industry to expect tougher penalties once the assessors get around to citations issued after March 31. Just how tough, though, they don't make clear.

None too clear, either, are officials' explanations, or non-explanations, of their penalty policies.

Most mysterious of all, perhaps, is Mr. Failor himself, the bureau's No.2 man and holder of a specially created title that may be one of the longest in Washington: staff associate to the director and chief, Office of Assessment and Compliance Assistance. Although his assessors say they are hewing to an informal penalty schedule approved by their chief, Mr. Failor smilingly denies the existence of any such sub rosa procedure.

"Assessors using another assessment table?" he scoffs with the innocence of comedian Danny Kaye, whom he slightly resembles. "How can I know what is in somebody else's mind?"

An Interior Department lawyer is more candid. He acknowledges that the assessment schedule published by the Interior Department in January differs from the one being followed in practice, but he insists the deviations are perfectly legal. Then why hasn't the published version been amended to reflect actual assessments? Well, concedes the lawyer, perhaps this sure weather systems tend to suck bigger amounts of explosive methane gas from coal seams into mine passages.

Ignoring the Criteria

In its report criticizing safety enforcement, the GAO found that the bureau's assessment chief "has established his own schedule" for penalties and wasn't taking into account six criteria prescribed in the 1969 law for determining assessments. Among them: possible negligence on the part of a mine owner and his history of previous violations. The GAO said it was told previous violations weren't affecting penalties "because the period March 30, 1970, to April 1, 1971, is being considered as an educational period for the operators to become familiar with all the provisions of the act."

Several months before release of the GAO report, Democratic Rep. Ken Hechler of West Virginia, who regularly attacks the mines agency as favoring the "coal barons," complained to Interior Secretary Rogers Morton: "It would seem that (an assessor) must consider these (six) factors only if he wants to increase the minimum or decrease the maximum penalty set forth in the guidelines."

In reply, Assistant Secretary Hollis Dole, Mr. Osborn's immediate boss, explained that the penalty ranges announced in January are only "general" guidelines. He then referred to a footnote to the penalty table that states: "Consideration of all relevant circumstances . . . may warrant . . . a civil penalty . . . more or less than the range set forth above."

Slicing the Bill

If bureau assessors have such latitude (and the assessors themselves say they don't), it's tightly circumscribed by Mr. Failor. This is evident in cases chosen at random from files in the bureau's assessment office. Consider the treatment of more than 150 safety violations alleged against the Federal No. 2 mine in Monongalia County, W.Va., owned by Eastern Associated Coal Corp., a subsidiary of Eastern Gas & Fuel Associates.

Assessing the 95 citations issued in 1970 at Federal No. 2, the bureau proposed that the company pay $13,225—$4,000 for two "imminent hazard" withdrawal orders at $2,000 each; $9,200 for 92 "serious" violations (involving practices likely to cause death or serious harm to miners, though not an imminent hazard) at a flat $100 apiece, and $25 for a single "nonserious" violation.

After Eastern protested these assessments, many of the alleged serious violations were reduced to the nonserious category, slicing the total bill to $8,675. Eastern now has paid $3,350 of the reduced amount and says it will seek a hearing on the remainder.

A second round of proposed assessments, covering citations issued during the first three months of 1971, calls for an additional $13,200 payment for Federal No. 2. This time the assessors had five "imminent hazard" withdrawal orders to consider, but their suggested penalty for each remained unchanged at $2,000.

The first of these 1971 orders was issued on Jan. 21 when an inspector said he found excessive amounts of loose (and possibly explosive) coal in one section of the mine.

A Tidy Saving

The latest of the five orders came on March 16, when an inspector found widespread deposits of tiny coal particles called "coal float dust." In addition, one of the rubber-tired coal shuttle cars had "excessive accumulations of oil spillage" and an opening in the front headlight lens-holder greater than the .006 inch allowed by law; a second shuttle car had loose packing around its rear electrical junction box, the inspector said. (Electrical connections open to mine atmosphere can be a source of explosion-causing sparks.)

It's impossible to say how much the coal industry is saving altogether because of Mr. Failor's assessment policy, but the effect of the bargain rates for "imminent hazard" withdrawal orders alone is fairly easy to measure. Had the bureau assessors been guided by the published $5,000 minimum, penalties proposed for such orders issued through March 31 probably would total around $6 million. In fact, however, they are expected to amount to only about $2.5 million. Actual penalties for all types of violations during the period up to March 31 probably will only come to $4.5 million. (Though many of the cases date back before January, some as far as the spring of 1970, penalties in most cases weren't assessed until after the guidelines were drawn up.)

One intriguing comment on whether the Failor policy satisfies the intention of the 1969 act is contained in an opinion that an Interior Department hearing examiner recently handed down in the case of a small Wise County, Va., coal operator—the first occasion for an examiner's review of assessments proposed by the bureau under the law.

The respondent, Robert G. Lawson Coal Co., originally was assessed $800; the bureau later reduced the amount to $525. (The company failed to pay the proposed figure and wasn't represented at the hearing.) However, Examiner Alfred P. Whittaker, after applying the law's six criteria to 21 citations against the company, concluded that a total of $9,800 in penalties—almost 20 times the bureau's figure—was called for.

Discussing the question of employer negligence as a factor in the stiffest single assessment, $1,750, that he recommended, Mr. Whittaker said: "There is no evidence in the record which tends to show affirmatively that the respondent took any action at any time to shut down the mine in question or to curtail his production of coal by shifting any of his mine workmen to the urgent task of correcting the very real hazard.

"Such action . . . clearly would have implemented the vital congressional intent to improve the actual working conditions in the coal mines."

Timken Co. Equipment Spending

CANTON, Ohio—Timken Co. said it plans to spend more than $2 million during the next two years on new bearing-component production equipment at its Canton and Columbus, Ohio, plants.

Penalties proposed in less serious cases have been pegged at the published minimum. And, on Mr. Failor's instructions, Bureau of Mines assessors have refrained from raising the penalty for mines where these types of withdrawal orders have been issued again and again.

A few weeks ago, in accusing the bureau of laggard safety enforcement, Congress' General Accounting Office cited a failure to "assess sufficiently large penalties" in order to induce "mine operators to take the necessary actions to insure full compliance" with the Coal Mine Health and Safety Act of 1969.

How Tough? Nobody Knows

Singed by such criticism, bureau officials have been warning the coal industry to expect tougher penalties once the assessors get around to citations issued after March 31. Just how tough, though, they don't make clear.

None too clear, either, are officials' explanations, or non-explanations, of their penalty policies.

Most mysterious of all, perhaps, is Mr. Failor himself, the bureau's No.2 man and holder of a specially created title that may be one of the longest in Washington: staff associate to the director and chief, Office of Assessment and Compliance Assistance. Although his assessors say they are hewing to an informal penalty schedule approved by their chief, Mr. Failor smilingly denies the existence of any such sub rosa procedure.

"Assessors using another assessment table?" he scoffs with the innocence of comedian Danny Kaye, whom he slightly resembles. "How can I know what is in somebody else's mind?"

An Interior Department lawyer is more candid. He acknowledges that the assessment schedule published by the Interior Department in January differs from the one being followed in practice, but he insists the deviations are perfectly legal. Then why hasn't the published version been amended to reflect actual assessments? Well, concedes the lawyer, perhaps this would be embarrassing evidence of bureau concessions to coal companies.

If coal companies are appreciative of the penalty policy, though, there's little evidence in their carefully guarded comments. Island Creek "has made no attempt to evaluate the propriety" of the bureau's assessments, a spokesman says, but the amounts "undoubtedly reflect the best judgment of the Bureau of Mines considering its limited experience under the new law."

Joseph E. Moody, president of the Bituminous Coal Operators' Association, whose members produce about two-thirds of U.S. coal, has only harsh words for the entire penalty procedure. Under the Mine Safety Act, "major and multiple penalties can be assessed without the accused having recourse to a day in court or a determination of the fact," Mr. Moody complains.

Officially, Bureau of Mines policy-makers tend to agree with the coal industry that too-stiff penalties imposed under the 1969 law could antagonize mine operators and possibly hurt U.S. coal production.

Not Fund-Raising for Widows

"This isn't a revenue measure; we're not trying to raise money for the widows. All the bureau wants to do is get compliance with the law," asserts Bureau of Mines Director Elburt F. Osborn.

But Mr. Osborn, a geochemist who was a Pennsylvania State University vice president before coming to Washington last October, seems uncertain about the details of his bureau's assessment program. When a reporter notes that the proposed penalties for "imminent hazard" withdrawal orders have consistently been $3,000 lower than the minimum published guideline figure, he professes ignorance of the fact. "I'll look into it," he promises. "Maybe that's something we shouldn't be doing."

Some others in Washington are more concerned. Senate Labor Committee Chairman Harrison A. Williams of New Jersey, a key sponsor of the 1969 act, believes soft penalties may be one reason the law hasn't done more to reduce mine deaths.

Indeed, between April 1, 1970 and June 30, 1971, the number of miners killed in accidents, including 38 men caught in a Leslie County, Ky., mine blast last December, shot up to 309 from 246 in the preceding 15-month period. During the past six months the trend apparently reversed; only 97 men died, six fewer than in 1970's first half and the lowest number of mine fatalities since 1946. But a Bureau of Mines safety expert warns that the trend won't be solid until it takes into account the dangerous October-December period when low-pres-

Eight Small Strip Mining Firms Challenge Coal Mine Safety Act as Unconstitutional

12/2/71

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

PITTSBURGH — Some strip coal mining companies challenged the 1969 Coal Mine Health and Safety Act in U.S. district court here.

The suit, which asks for an injunction against enforcement of the federal act and a hearing on its constitutionality by a panel of three federal judges, was filed by eight small strip mine companies from Western Pennsylvania's Butler and Mercer counties. Although similar suits have been filed by underground mining companies in Virginia and Kentucky, this is the first known one by strip miners.

The companies, which say they mined 900,000 tons of coal last year, contend that enforcement of the act by the U.S. Bureau of Mines would result in the unconstitutional confiscation of private property by preventing them from mining coal.

They also assert that bureau inspectors aren't qualified to judge strip mines and are using regulations written for underground operations. They also say that they have been told to put rollbars on bulldozers and backup warning sirens on mobile equipment, devices they claim are nonexistant.

However, Robert Barrett, acting manager of the Bureau of Mines district for Western Pennsylvania and who is named as a defendant in the suit along with Interior Secretary Rogers Morton and Health, Education and Welfare Secretary Elliot Richardson called the criticism unfounded. "At least a half dozen suppliers have told me they can install sirens," Mr. Barrett said, "and roll-bars are certainly nothing new either."

But Mr. Barrett conceded that frequent inspection of strip mines in his area is new. He said his department has concentrated on underground mine inspection because these have "the biggest hazards." Bureau of Mines regulations for strip mines took effect in July, and when the recent coal strike closed down most underground mines, inspectors were able to concentrate on strip mines, he said.

A date for a preliminary hearing on the suit hasn't been set.

Coalfield Clash

No Matter Who Wins Mine Workers' Fight, Union Likely to Change

Vote Seen Too Close to Call; Troubled but Strong Boyle Retains Loyalties of Many

9/8/72

'Can Live Without Violence'

By JOHN V. CONTI
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

PITTSBURGH — Another bitter battle for control of the turbulent United Mine Workers union is about to be waged in the nation's coalfields.

On one side is incumbent president W. A. (Tony) Boyle, the 70-year-old successor to John L. Lewis. In 11 years in office, Mr. Boyle has followed the Lewis tradition of ruling with an autocratic and often dictatorial hand. In seeking to retain power in the 190,000-member union for another five years, Mr. Boyle clearly has troubles. He has been convicted of misusing union funds. His reign has been tainted by the murder of Joseph A. (Jock) Yablonski, his rival in the last UMW election in 1969. And he is being forced to run for office at this time because the courts found evidence of widespread irregularities in that 1969 election and declared it void.

Pitted against him is Arnold Ray Miller, 49, a plain-spoken former local union president from Ohley, W. Va., who leads the Miners for Democracy, an angry and potent coalition of rank-and-file dissidents formed by followers of Mr. Yablonski after his death. Mr. Miller says he wants to be president so he can "make it impossible for there ever to be another Tony Boyle in the United Mine Workers union."

A Sour-Tempered Affair

The campaign, which got under way this week with big Labor Day rallies for both sides, promises to be a mean and sour-tempered affair. Mr. Boyle's men call Arnold Miller a know-nothing radical controlled by outsiders bent on destroying the union. The Miners for Democracy has compared Mr. Boyle with Adolf Hitler and vows to cleanse the union of its reputation for malfeasance and murder.

The voting will be held Dec. 1 through Dec. 8. Talks with miners, company men and others throughout the Appalachian coalfields indicate that both candidates have considerable support. The best guess now is that the fight will be close. Whatever the outcome, though, this contest between the reformers and the forces "loyal to Boyle" could well result in a reshaped union.

Mr. Boyle, for all his troubles with the law, retains a firm grip on the loyalties of many miners. Even his opponents concede he'll run well among the union's 70,000 retired members, many of whom had first-hand experience in the union's early struggles under Mr. Lewis and remain loyal to his successor. Others say they've fared well under Mr. Boyle's leadership. Wages, which will reach $50 a day by the end of next year, are "more than any man in the mines ever expected to make," says Bob Sparks, a 39-year-old shuttle-car operator at a Bethlehem Steel Co. mine near Jenkins, Ky. "We've progressed always."

In addition, there's a deep suspicion among some miners that the government's charges against their leader—such as his recent conviction for illegally using union funds to support the 1968 Democratic campaign of Hubert Humphrey—are politically motivated. "He hasn't done one thing more than the rest of the unions in giving money to the politicians," claims Elijah Clouse, a recently retired miner from McRoberts, Ky.

"I Made a Mistake"

Still, if there's any edge in the contest so far, it may well belong to Mr. Miller. He leads what could prove to be one of the strongest rank-and-file "reform" movements in the history of American labor. He has inherited the supporters of Mr. Yablonski, who was credited with 46,000 votes, or about a third of the ballots cast, in the voided 1969 election. And from all evidence, he's attracting many other miners whose allegiance to the beleaguered union hierarchy has waned—and in some cases turned to hostility—in the wake of the barrage of charges, investigations and court action.

"I made a mistake in voting for Tony Boyle last time," says John Ratliffas, a retired miner from Meador, W.Va. "And if he's guilty of what they've got him on, then I made a big mistake."

Mr. Miller has several advantages Mr. Yablonski didn't have three years ago. For one thing, there's likely to be an honest vote. Balloting this year will take place under the strictest supervision that the U.S. Labor Department has ever given any union election. Department men will be at each polling place, and it's they who will carry the sealed ballot boxes back to Washington for counting. (In ordering the new election last May, federal Judge William B. Bryant found, among numerous other violations, that the secret ballot had been denied at some polling places in 1969 and that the salaries of many union employes had been raised to insure their support for Mr. Boyle.)

The Bees From Washington

The union is currently being run under a virtual Labor Department trusteeship. Department monitors are present in all UMW offices with authority to inspect all books and turn down any financial transaction until the election. "The Labor Department guys have been all over us like a swarm of bees," one union staffer complains.

Mr. Miller's candidacy is also receiving favorable publicity in the United Mine Workers Journal, the religiously read, twice-monthly union newspaper—a stark contrast to 1969 when Mr. Yablonski's campaign was barely mentioned. Judge Bryant ordered the Journal to turn over equal space to the MFD. Thus while the Journal in the past had never said anything less than laudatory about Mr. Boyle, a recent issue carried this heretical headline: "Boyle Conviction Is Shocking, Embarrassing to UMWA Members." (See story about the Journal on page 17.)

Unlike most struggles for power in American unions, the contest in the UMW isn't a palace revolt pitting one established union leader against another. Mr. Miller has never held

Is This Any Way to Run a Newspaper? The Only Way, Says Labor Department

By ELLIOT CARLSON
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON—There's a new team of editors over at the United Mine Workers Journal, and they're making something unique out of the small union newspaper.

They never see each other, never know what the other is writing, never agree on anything and accuse each other of bias. When they aren't name-calling, they're hauling each other into court to expunge something written by the other. This happens approximately all the time, which delays the 180,000-copy press run and makes one or the other editor even angrier.

Is this any way to run a newspaper? Well, yes, according to Federal Judge William Bryant, who ruled last May that the paper had been used illegally to promote the reelection of W. A. (Tony) Boyle as UMW president. For this and other alleged irregularities, Judge Bryant set the election aside and ordered a new one to be held later this year under Labor Department supervision.

The judge also turned supervision of the union's semimonthly newspaper over to the Labor Department, with the stipulation that dissident miners get access to it. So the department worked out a complex formula whereby half the 32-page paper is straight news and the rest is divided among the various candidates for posts in the UMW election.

In the Journal's second section, anybody can say just about anything he wants. So the Miners for Democracy, the dissident group formed after the death of Joseph A. (Jock) Yablonski, who was murdered shortly after he lost the 1969 election to Mr. Boyle, consider the Journal as much theirs as anybody else's. And they've named 26-year-old Don Stillman, editor of the dissidents' Miners Voice, to edit their portion of the Journal. He calls himself the "section editor."

In a Word: Schizophrenic

All of this enrages Justin McCarthy, 57, the paper's regular editor, who says Judge Bryant's decision "amounts to seizure of private property" and "violates freedom of the press." Mr. Stillman disagrees. "Until now," he asserts, "free speech for miners opposed to Boyle has been nonexistent. The paper wouldn't even carry letters to the editor from them."

There's only one word to describe the tabloid as it has appeared under Judge Bryant's decision: schizophrenic. This split personality reflects the two men who do most of the work. They have little in common except for journalism.

Mr. McCarthy, rumpled and bearded, is an old pro who worked for years on the old Chicago Sun before taking over at the Journal in 1955. The $22,600-a-year editor and his three-member staff work out of spacious headquarters here that were converted from a bank into a newsroom. He's also a dues-paying member of the UMW, and he calls Mr. Stillman, who isn't, an "outsider."

The mustachioed Mr. Stillman, only a few years out of school, is still learning the business. He's paid a token $100 a month from the Miners for Democracy and $4,500 a year from the Appalachian Public Interest Journalism Group, a foundation-financed organization set up to improve news coverage in the Appalachian area. He and his two-member staff operate out of a ramshackle four-room office in Charleston, W.Va., in the middle of the coal-producing region.

From the start, it has been just one thing after another. The first issue under the new order, scheduled to be published July 1, was delayed a week because UMW lawyers protested that Mr. Stillman was "usurping" the Journal's regular masthead for dissident editorials. What especially rankled UMW officials was that the editorial began: "The sentencing of W. A. (Tony) Boyle to five years in federal prison for criminal embezzlement came as a shock, not just to Boyle's shrinking cadre of supporters but to most UMW members." (Mr. Boyle is appealing the conviction, which involved the use of union funds for political contributions.)

News or Propaganda?

Judge Bryant barred the Miners for Democracy from using the masthead, reasoning that it was union property and might confuse readers. The dissident editorials now run under a masthead that simply says, "editorials."

For its part, the dissident group has had a few complaints with Mr. McCarthy. In July, Miners for Democracy charged that he was letting part of the 16 pages set aside for "neutral" news stories be used for propaganda from pro-Boyle candidates. Though the Labor Department had permitted this to make room for late-arriving copy from new candidates, the dissidents contended it was all part of a trick to get in more material from pro-Boyle people. Judge Bryant blocked the practice from being repeated.

Ultimately, the journalistic standoff will be settled by miners in the election in December. The UMW, however, is appealing the judge's order calling for the election, partly on the ground that insofar as his order affects the Journal it violates the freedom of the press. But the dissidents contend the Journal was used in violation of the Landrum-Griffin Law, which forbids money raised from members' dues to be spent on behalf of any union candidate.

more than a local union office. Moreover, he didn't create the coalition he leads. He was elected the MFD standard bearer at a "reformers'" convention in Wheeling, W. Va., last May. His power and influence are tied to the strong grass-roots support the Miners for Democracy movement has attracted.

A man with a reputation for quiet and effective work, Mr. Miller is making reform the theme of his campaign. "It's time to restructure the union and make it responsive," he tells UMW members in mine-site speeches. And the former mine mechanic repeatedly tells a reporter, "My one goal is to bring democracy to this union." If elected, he says, he plans to serve only one term and then relinquish power. He would cut the salaries of top officials, including the president's (currently $50,000 a year), and move the union's headquarters from Washington to somewhere central to the coalfields, like Charleston, W. Va.

He would put more power into the hands of UMW members by requiring that all district officers and executive boards be elected. Currently, most officers in the union's 24 districts are appointed by Mr. Boyle, a practice that courts in recent decisions involving eight districts have found in violation of federal law. Mr. Miller also promises to put an end to the union's notorious nepotism and abolish the practice of allowing some favored union officials to hold more than one office.

While he has little to say about wages, he charges that the Boyle administration has been capricious at best and corrupt at worst in its handling of other union affairs. A shoddy administration of UMW pension funds, for instance, has cost many retired miners the benefits they're due, Mr. Miller contends. He promises to raise pensions to $200 a month from the current $150 a month for soft-coal miners and only $30 a month for anthracite workers. Mr. Boyle is vulnerable to the attack: the courts have thrown him off the board of trustees of the union's pension fund and have found the union and the National Bank of Washington, which the UMW controls, guilty of conspiring to misuse pension funds. At one point, the bank held $70 million in UMW pension funds in interest-free accounts.

A Violent Past

Mr. Miller also points to the 44,000 nonunion bituminous coal miners in the country today as proof that the UMW under Mr. Boyle has neglected its organizing chores. And he cites recent mine disasters to underscore his claim that the union has been lax in pressing for more stringent safety regulations.

But always there's the undercurrent of the union's violent past. "There's been blood throughout the history of this union," says Herbert Hurley, a 43-year-old miner and MFD supporter in Peck's Mill, W. Va. "But people are beginning to realize that we can live without violence."

Mr. Boyle hasn't been implicated in the slayings of Mr. Yablonski, his wife and daughter, which occurred three weeks after the 1969 vote. But Albert Pass, a member of the union's 26-man policy-making executive board, and another, lesser, union official will go on trial for murder in the case in Washington, Pa., in a few weeks. Five other persons, none of them union officials, already have been convicted in the slayings. (However, a court has ordered Mr. Boyle to pay damages to the Yablonski heirs on the ground that the 1969 challenger was removed from a high union post in reprisal for his decision to run against Mr. Boyle for the presidency.)

"Our problem," confides Harry Patrick, the Miners for Democracy candidate for secretary-treasurer, "is to separate the union from its leadership.

Boyle Campaign

In contrast to the early hustle and bustle of the MFD effort, Mr. Boyle has been slow to get his campaign under way and apparently is having trouble financing it. He didn't pick a slate of running mates until mid-July. His choices, however, have strengthened his ticket; two aging running mates from past years, Vice President George Titler, who is 77, and Secretary-Treasurer John Owens, 82, were dropped for younger men. Mr. Titler, in fact, resigned his office and was replaced by Leonard J. Pnakovich, 53, a respected district leader from Fairmont, W. Va.

Mr. Pnakovich, in fact, could become the next UMW president. Mr. Boyle is appealing his recent conviction in the political-contributions case, but if he's unsuccessful he'll be barred by federal law from holding union office for five years. If such a ruling should come after an election that the two incumbents win, Mr. Pnakovich would automatically ascend to the top. Should Mr. Boyle be ousted from office before the balloting, the newly appointed vice president would become interim president and could complete the campaign from a position of power.

Mr. Boyle has rarely spoken to reporters in recent years and wouldn't be interviewed for this story. Mr. Pnakovich, however, is more accessible, and he readily outlines the main theme of the Boyle campaign: that "outsiders are trying to take over and disrupt and control the union." Mr. Boyle stressed the same theme at a big Labor Day rally in Grundy, Va.

"There's no telling who all is behind this movement," the UMW vice president says of the Miners for Democracy. But he hints that the Atomic Energy Commission and corporate interests (others add John D. (Jay) Rockefeller IV, the Democratic candidate for governor of West Virginia and heir to the Standard Oil fortune) are somehow involved and are seeking to control the country's energy sources. "The miner's union is important from the standpoint that coal is energy and energy is scarce at the moment," Mr. Pnakovich asserts.

A Changed Union

In addition, he believes that the MFD campaign is being financed by "foundations," a charge that the MFD denies. While the MFD contends that it has raised only about $30,000 for Mr. Miller's campaign from about 2,000 contributors, mostly miners, Mr. Pnakovich admits that finances are also proving a big problem for Mr. Boyle. Contributions from miners is a "pretty dry source" for both sides, the UMW official says, and the courts have forbidden union officers from accepting contributions from union employes. That leaves only their own pockets, and with the recent fines levied against Mr. Boyle, that source, too, is quite limited.

Whatever the outcome of the election, it's likely the Mine Workers union, over the next few years, will change vastly. George Titler and John Owens—two union stalwarts over the years and a true "old guard"—won't be around anymore. Tony Boyle, even if he wins, may well be unable to serve. Mr. Pnakovich, though closely tied to Mr. Boyle in the past, represents a new generation of UMW leadership that's yet to try its hand at the union's reins.

Should Mr. Pnakovich succeed to the union presidency, he may have to move in the direction of many of the changes proposed by the Miners for Democracy anyway—if only to keep the union together. The MFD is potent enough and the passions behind it great enough that it isn't likely to just wither away if its candidates lose this year.

Among other things, there will clearly be more political activity in the union because of the court rulings requiring the election of district officials. Thus even if they lose this time, the MFD insurgents will have the opportunity to build political power bases in their districts, to bring a variety of views to the executive board and to keep pressure on the leadership.

Many company men, for their part, fear that both sides are so strong that internal fighting will continue no matter who wins—perhaps leading to a continuation of the pattern of frequent wildcat strikes that have occurred in recent years, largely because no one in the union has been strong enough to prevent them.

Waste for Wastelands

Chicago's Use of Sewage Sludge in Effort to Make Strip-Mined Areas Fertile Again Stirs Controversy

By JOSEPH WINSKI
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

CHICAGO — It sounds reasonable enough: Instead of burying, burning or dumping all the sewage sludge that the country pours out every day, spread it out on farmland and even barren wasteland to make things grow.

Chicago, which operates the world's largest sewage treatment works, is doing just that in an ambitious project conducted jointly by the city sanitary district and a commercial company. The effort is getting raves from environmentalists, scientists and city sanitation officials—just about everybody, in fact, except the folks down in Grundy County, some 60 miles southwest of Chicago. In 1971, they ran a Chicago sludge-spreading operation out because, as one local man put it: "We don't want Chicago's ____ in our back yard."

Thus, Chicago's efforts exemplify two countercurrents in the clean-up-the-environment movement. On the one hand, more and more efforts are under way to turn America's growing mountains of waste into benefits rather than pollutants. But on the other hand, more and more pockets of resistance are popping up among people who don't want wastes used around them no matter how helpful or ecologically safe. The static generated by these opposing forces may prove more troublesome to pollution-control efforts than any technological or economic hurdles, some observers fear.

There are few waste problems as awesome as disposing of the millions of tons of sewage sludge that U.S. cities produce annually. Sludge is the black, paint-thick stuff that's left over after raw sewage has been decomposed and the purified water siphoned off. Pittsburgh and Indianapolis burn it, hoping nobody complains about air pollution. Milwaukee heats it, dries it and sells it as fertilizer for gardens. New York and other coastal cities dump it in the oceans.

The Oldest of All

Chicago has tried some of these methods as well as digging holes and filling them up with its sludge. Now it is trying the oldest waste-disposal method of all—spreading it out on the land. The concept didn't go over in Grundy county, but now the sanitary district is loading 60% of its daily production of 1,000 tons of sludge into barges and sending it down the Illinois River to Fulton County, 170 miles southwest of the city.

The sanitary district owns 7,000 acres there that have been ravaged by strip mining. It has been fertilizing 800 of those acres with sludge since August 1971 in a project called the Prairie Plan. This year's harvest yielded 60 bushels of corn on eight-foot stalks per sludge-fertilized acre, compared with 13 bushels on spindly three-foot plants on nearby unfertilized land.

"Our goal is to put the solid wastes of 10 million people (5.5 million residents plus industrial wastes equivalent to 4.5 million more) back on the land," says Bart Lynam, the sanitary district's operating chief. That would require only 30,000 tillable acres, officials say.

To facilitate this, the sanitary district plans eventually to build a pipeline to Fulton County to transport sludge. That would reduce the costs of sludge disposal to less than $35 a ton. Burning it, the cheapest of the other alternatives, costs Chicago from $55 to $70 a ton, which is about what barging currently costs. The sanitary district already has spent $35 million setting up the Prairie Plan and expects to spend $100 million more to build the pipeline and acquire more land.

Sprayed Farmlands

The Prairie Plan isn't revolutionary, by any means. Small "sludge farms" have operated in Europe for many years, and Melbourne, Australia, has irrigated pastureland with raw sewage for 50 years. In a pioneering effort in the U.S., Pennsylvania State University has experimented for the past decade with spraying farmland with treated effluent in liquid form. Similar projects have been conducted successfully elsewhere on small scales.

What is new about Chicago's project is its sheer size—and thus its implications for other cities with sludge-disposal problems and for a nation with more than two million acres of barren, stripped land. The Chicago experiments have demonstrated that with proper controls sludge can be applied on a wide scale without danger of spreading disease-causing bacteria, says T. D. Hinesly, soil ecology professor at the University of Illinois.

Sludge can't be used indiscriminately, though. It is rich in nitrogen and contains trace amounts of heavy metals; if it were applied to already-rich farmland, excess nitrogen would run off as nitrates, polluting water supplies, and the metal elements could build up to toxic levels. For these reasons, the Illinois Environmental Protection Agency recently denied one request to fertilize some farmland with more than 25 tons of sludge annually.

Prof. Hinesly and other experts think sludge is thus best suited for stripped and other barren landscapes. In a recent test, the U.S. Department of Agriculture applied up to 500 tons of sludge an acre—about 20 times the usual amount—on infertile sandy soil for six months and found "no evidence of contamination" of ground water. "This concept is really going to take off," confidently predicts Mr. Lynam of the Chicago sanitary district.

So why did it flop in Grundy County? Eugene Sorenson, a county zoning official who smilingly describes himself as "the fly in the ointment," explains: "The cities feel the land is here and they can use it without paying attention to the people. They tell us they're doing a good thing and we should be grateful."

Democratic Waste

Grundy County people were anything but grateful, Mr. Sorenson says. They didn't like the way the county board was bypassed when the operations were set up. They didn't like the way a passing school bus was sprayed with sludge, or the way the stuff was "sprayed all over the road." Rural, Republican Grundy County didn't like Democratic, big-city waste being "dumped on us."

Besides, the deal literally stank, people complained. Mrs. Robert Trotter, who lives near the farmland that was being sprayed with sludge, says the "awful sewer smell" got so bad, especially in humid weather, that she sometimes had to take her children into the nearby town of Morris for relief. Similar complaints flooded in. Two months after Soil Enrichment Materials Corp. (SEMCO), which has a sludge disposal contract with the sanitary district, began spraying sludge, the county won a court injunction barring further applications.

John Lear, SEMCO vice president (and former science editor of Saturday Review), dismisses Grundy County's reaction as the product of "all these fears, all these local superstitions." He concedes it was something other than superstition that splattered the school bus, but he contends that "we found no evidence of any offensive odor." Sludge has a tarry smell that isn't objectionable, its supporters say.

Some advocates of sludge use say any bad odor is mostly psychological, a theory corroborated by Richard Williams, a former newspaper publisher in Douglas County in Central Illinois, the site of another SEMCO sludge operation. "One of my contributors came in one day sputtering about the 'terrible, horrible stink' of the sludge," he says. "I had to tell her they hadn't brought in a teaspoonful of the stuff yet."

Plowed In, Not Sprayed

The much-feared bad smells never came, Mr. Williams says, and "people here don't talk about the sludge anymore. The only guy still against it sells commercial fertilizer; he thinks sludge will hurt his business." (It won't, SEMCO says, because sludge is low in potash and thus needs to be supplemented with commercial fertilizer. Also, the potential fertilizer market is 240 million acres of cropland, while an estimated one million acres would accommodate all the sludge produced in the U.S., officials say.)

One reason Douglas County doesn't have an odor problem is that SEMCO doesn't spray the sludge on the land but plows it into the ground. Mr. Lear thinks this method could redeem sludge's reputation in Grundy County, but he doubts he will get a chance to try. The door is being slammed in other places, too.

Recently, the Army Corps of Engineers shelved waste disposal plans for northwest Indiana that called in part for spreading sludge on farmland. Public hearings on the plans drew what one observer called "the greatest outcry of public protest in the state in years;" the corps says that "public reaction contributed to our decision." The state of Maine, apparently fearing a rumored invasion of Boston sludge, passed a law prohibiting all imports of solid wastes into the state. An ambitious $39 million project to spray treated sewage, water and all, on 6,000 sandy acres in Muskegon County, Mich., will begin in January now that a lengthy legal battle finally has been settled by the county's three circuit judges.

Meanwhile, other means of putting wastes to use are being considered and are running into resistance as well. A consulting firm recently suggested that Chicago mix sludge with rock and trash and pile it high enough to make a hill for skiing in a nearby county. The "Citizens Against Garbage Mountain" held their first meeting in August.

ORGANIZED LABOR and WORKMEN'S CIRCLE

Awards Banquet

1026 Hurt Building

Atlanta, Ga. 30303 524-5001

You are cordially invited to attend the first annual Labor Awards Banquet, Thursday, May 1, 1969, to be held at the Sheraton-Biltmore Hotel, Atlanta, Georgia.

The guest of honor will be Joseph Jacobs, outstanding Georgia labor leader and attorney. Proceeds from the dinner will go to establish the Joseph Jacobs Labor History Archives at Georgia State College. These archives will begin the first collection of original documents of the labor movement in the South.

The Speaker of the evening will be Paul Hall, President of the Seafarers International Union of North America. Other outstanding national Labor Leaders will also be on the program.

There will be a reception for Brother Jacobs at 7:00 P.M. Dinner will be promptly at 8:00 P.M.

We are sure you will want to join with us in honoring Joseph Jacobs and to be a part of the establishment of the Southern Labor Archives.

Since wide participation is certain, you are urged to mail the enclosed reservation form together with your check as soon as possible.

Sincerely and fraternally,

Re: Labor Education in Atlanta and Georgia

~~I am asking a group of union leaders to meet together~~

During the past year a number of union leaders have discussed with me and with each other the need for further labor education services in Atlanta and Georgia. One possibility is to work with a university to establish a full-time labor education program.

I have been urged to call a meeting, across various union lines, so that this matter can be discussed informally. I very much hope that you will be able to attend.

2:00PM, ~~Thursday~~ Wednesday, January 7, 1970

~~2:00 P.M.~~

Dear Emery:

Sorry to be so tardy in corresponding with you about the conference. The enclosed announcement supplies the cast of characters, as well as the plot outline.

The contract terms, as I think I mentioned on the phone, are $150 plus expenses. I assume you may find it difficult making plane connections directly to Bloomington. If this is the case, shoot for Indianapolis and I will have one of our student assistants pick you up and bring you to campus. I will reserve a room for you in the Union Building for Friday night.

Thanks for agreeing to participate in the conference, and thanks also for the prompt compliance with my request for a biographical sketch.

Sincerely,

Dale

Dr. Emory V. Via

Haines, ~~I would like to~~ thank you very much ~~on~~ for that introduction. ~~The topic tonight, if I were~~ To be very honest with you, tonight's topic has caused me to ~~think through about~~ ponder five or six times, just how it should be approached. The difficulty, as speaker and educator, is how to present to an unknown group a problem of great interest to me but one which because of changing conditions and attitudes raises the question of what should be said about it today. ~~I could give you a sad demonstration, perhaps, of the kind of process the speaker, or the educator, as I like to think of myself as being, goes through in trying to approach an unknown group on a subject in which he has a great deal of interest; but also has some problems as to just what should be said today about this particular set of problems.~~

I have decided ~~on several courses and I have selected one.~~ to follow more than one approach. The first ~~course, I guess,~~ is to state ~~that there are~~ some rather obvious things, ~~and~~ some of the most obvious and the most simply stated still seem to be the most important. ~~things that need to be said.~~ So at the risk of telling you what you already know, I will follow this course. ~~I will have to say things that many of you have heard before.~~

After deciding to follow more than one approach I scribbled a note to myself in the effort to overcome some of the burden I would thereby place on you. The note said, in brief, not too much of a hodge-podge. ~~Secondly, sometime between when Dale Brickner invited me and yesterday, I had scribbled a note that said, don't give too much of a hodge-podge because some of us who teach two hour sessions and then are confronted with a shorter time period have a tendency to try to jam everything into the short time, and man, do you jump all over.~~ Whether the note will have the desired effect remains to be seen.

What I would like for us to do is to begin to ask of ourselves, and then in turn, ~~hopefully,~~ ask of our organizations, whether ~~they be union or official~~ unions or public bodies, further questions about problems of poverty in our country and in our individual states and communities. ~~I, myself, think that~~ It is ~~still~~ possible that we are breaking out of some old ways of thinking about how poverty problems should be ~~dealt with~~ handled. There are few people more important to this process than those who are in various kinds of public employment, but more about that later.

Can we, ~~along with~~ and the rest of the nation, move away from leveling blame on individuals who are poor, having at this considered them ~~in the past, sometimes~~, as ~~being~~ people lacking in character, people who have some moral fault, so therefore, are poor? Can we think substantially more constructively about what needs to be done in terms of our attitudes, and the attitudes of ~~various~~ the members of our organizations. What needs to be done in terms of ~~what might be called~~ institutional arrangements (or if you would like, "the system," or in some cases, "the establishment," to ~~just~~ use ~~some of the terms that float around~~ commonly popular terms.) that will make our society one in which poverty is not a grinding, ever-present fact of life for a sizeable portion of our citizens? Hopefully, we can begin to ask ~~more and more~~ of ourselves, ~~of~~ our public institutions, ~~of~~ our political leaders, the ~~right~~ kinds of questions that will lead us to reasonable and useful solutions to the problems of the poor.

Sometimes, in teaching adults, I ~~classes~~ have simply started out with a rather broad ~~scale~~ question such as, "what makes the good life?" Now, it is true, I have never been hired to be a philosopher, and get that is the kind of question that ~~I guess~~ Socrates and Plato were said ~~accused~~ to have ~~of throwing around in Athens at an earlier time~~ raised in in ancient Greece. When I have done this, ~~On occasion, I have done that and~~ I find an interesting ~~kind of~~ response ~~in dealing with adult students. That is, that~~ After a period of discussion ~~in private~~, there may be twenty or thirty ~~things~~ suggestions that I had scribbled ~~upon~~ on the blackboard. ~~and~~ When you look at them, there are several things that ~~sort of pop out.~~ stand out. One is that most of the ~~things~~ items that constitute the good life, in their terms, are things which they cannot get with their individual efforts alone. It takes some form of group activity, frequently some form of public or governmental activity. A second thing pops out. On a number of the ~~things~~ items that they would like to have for themselves, it is difficult to ~~get it for them~~ achieve them adequately unless you ~~get it~~ provide them for everyone.

I will give you one ~~suggestion~~ example. If you stop to think about it, you would put ~~yourselves in~~ good health for yourself on that list. But if ~~you keep~~ a part of ~~your~~ the population is sick for whatever reason, it is much more difficult to keep good health for the rest. In the old days we used to separate communities, ~~you know,~~ by where the railroad track was. Poor folks on this side, rich folks on the other, ~~side~~. One way of looking at this problem is quite simple. The railroad tracks may still be there, the poor folks may still be on the other side, ~~but~~ except that these days it may be the Interstate. If there are germs on one side, they, for better or for worse, do not know where the tracks are, do not know where the Interstate is, and they will jump over and all of us are likely to be infected. The same kind of thing could be said about problems relating to education, the economy, crime, and other community problems.

As we go along I would like to use ~~as I go along, these~~ two ideas. One is that there may be good cause for acting as a group, acting as a government, acting publicly to meet some of the ~~kinds of~~ problems that we will be talking about relating to poverty. And the other is a ~~one of the~~ practical reasons for doing so, which is ~~and again, I trust that we will come back to this, in~~ that we cannot achieve in ~~out of~~ life what we would like to have for ourselves and ~~for~~ our own unless we do substantially the same ~~better~~ for all of the population. Perhaps we can return to this.

Let's move from that kind of general identification to remind you of some of the ~~sorts of~~ facts, terms, and ways of looking at poverty which ~~that~~ have evolved over the past few years. These have developed ~~basically trying~~ to get at the problem of who are the poor, ~~to some degree, as to~~ what causes them to be poor, and to describe the ~~also what kinds of~~ situations in which ~~to~~ those who are poor find themselves. The easiest way, I guess, to describe poverty is to simply say there is not enough money in that person's ~~pants~~ pocket, or in that family, for a minimum adequate standard of living. ~~I think that this~~ It is ~~certainly~~ a good point from which to start. Although I may dwell more on money than some of the other issues, let me hastily add that the money component is by no means the only part. There are such important items as what is the level of education, what is the present and expected status of the person ~~that is~~ caught in poverty, what are his legitimate expectations, and I think that you can even go so far afield as to ask ~~such questions as to~~ what ~~kinds of~~ political ~~bounce~~ clout does such a person have. In other words, we are not talking only about money, but ~~we are talking~~ about status, expectation, and ability to influence decisions that effect the ~~lives~~ life of any citizen.

Let me apply a part of what I am saying. ~~give you just one idea of how this can be applied.~~ If a man is fifty-five years old, and still has a family of four around him, and is only making, say, thirty-six hundred dollars, he is, by any reasonable measure in American society, poor. Further, it will take exceptional ~~He is probably in tough~~ luck ~~in trying to~~ to get his out of ~~being poor.~~ Poverty However, ~~if you are~~ a young fellow, just out of college, ~~maybe married, maybe not, and either~~ married or not because ~~you~~ he wants ~~wanted~~ to start at the bottom, or wants ~~wanted~~ to do something special, ~~you are~~ and is ~~making~~ making thirty-six hundred dollars ~~and your~~ may not be in poverty. His legitimate expectations in life are quite different from the older man's. You ~~could~~ can at least raise the question ~~as to the money amount, even if it were less than $3600, (take it down to $3200) if it really constituted a low level of income, yes, poverty, perhaps not--~~ as to whether it is just low income or really poverty, if you follow that kind of distinction.

~~You ask what is the more or less official figure that says $3600 for a family of four, not rural, or at least not farming.~~ The question is frequently asked if $3600 for a non-farm family of four is an official or approximate money cut off point to describe poverty. If you go to ~~the~~ people who have been studying such problems ~~of poverty~~ to find ~~as to~~ whether $3600 is high enough, you may find that they will go all the way up to ~~$3,000, $3600, or $4,500~~ $4,500, $5,500 or $6,000. It sometimes depends on whether you ~~are~~ ask a welfare worker, an economist, a political scientist, or some other brand of nut, you see, as to what figure you would pick. But, an interesting thing, we have a fair amount of public reaction about paying too much attention to poverty. I guess you never hear it put in Indiana or Ohio, but in some of the places I go, there are complaints, about maybe we pay too much attention to these kinds of problems. I understand that the sophisticated and advanced Midwest not only does not react this way, but hardly has any problems of poverty at all to worry about, in any case. That may be as close as you are going to get to a joke, so if you want to laugh, laugh now. You can never tell when I will actually come through with a joke or not, somedays I get serious.

Mr. Gallup, in his famous poll, repeated something that he had done sometime before, in January of this year. He took a sample of American opinion as to what they thought was the minimum that a family of four could live on in their community, and they underscored minimum. They weren't asking "what do you live on," "what could you live on," "what is the minimum that someone else could live on?" The figure that came back from the good citizens of this area, including all the states represented here, was $120 per week. That would be a nice poverty standard to set, and I, for one, would be willing to work for it. A quick calculation means that you're going to come out somewhere close to $6,200 a year, give or take a few bucks, depending on whether you get your paid vacation or not. So much for the money part.

We have, in the country, if you are using the $3,600 figure, roughly 30 million people who are in poverty situations. They are either the wage earners, who do not make enough, or they are a member of his family, or they are members of families who have no wage earners. If you look at these people in terms of race you will find that nine million or so are non-white and twenty million or so are white. Those of us who are white, ~~and~~ because we get certain ~~kinds of~~ odd pictures in our mind~~s~~, sometimes think that all the discussion about poverty is mixed up somehow with the discussion about civil rights and that everybody that is poor, practically, is black. I simply submit to you this national figure which shows that two-thirds of all the poor in this country are white and one-third ~~is~~ are black. Nearly half of these people are located in small cities, towns, and rural areas, but nearly a third of them are in ~~the~~ central city areas. Some other facts of interest--(I am doing this partly so that we have ~~some~~ a common understanding of what the problem is before we get around to raising such questions that I might like to raise, and indeed, such questions that you might like to raise)--42% are under 18 years of age, 17% (don't worry about the specifics) are over 65. ~~What~~ This means ~~to~~ that well over half of the poor are people who have special ~~kinds of~~ problems due to age, and require special ~~kinds of~~ services from our society in order to be fully performing citizens at that age, ~~like~~ such as being a student, or being a retired pensioner--but of all the poor~~s~~, nearly 60% are in these special age categories--normally considered these days as nonwage earning categories.

Another problem ~~that~~ should at least be mentioned in passing, ~~I guess~~. We frequently think that those people who are poor ~~this is part of our thinking, that somehow or other it is their fault, not folks who work~~ are that way because of their own fault. For example they are people who do not or will not work. Again the figures tell us something else. Two-thirds of the heads of poor households work. Their work is spottier than what I would like, what they would like, and, I guess, than what you would like, but at least a third of those working, worked full-time. By full-time, just to give you the definitions, we mean more than 39 hours a week, and 50 to 52 weeks a year. I call that full-time. I trust that all of you who are union members consider it full-time. Those of you who are management representatives may have been arguing about this recently. I will leave that argument to ~~a~~ local decisions.

There is ~~One~~ other ~~sort of~~ fact problem. A ~~All~~ of this time ~~that~~ I have been talking about 30 million poor persons. I have not yet talked about the group that ~~sometimes~~ gets picked on most, that is the group ~~that is~~ actually on public assistance or welfare, ~~or whatever other term you feel is appropriate~~. Of the 30 million, just about 8.7 million ~~27.7%, or some such figure~~, are ~~is~~ on public assistance. It may be that a racial breakdown would be of interest again, perhaps not. Yes, you would like to know: 3.2 million are non-white, 4.5 million are white. Okay, now of ~~now of this group,~~ the group ~~that is~~ on public assistance, two million are over 65, four million are children, (that's three-fourths of the group already taken care of, right?) one million are the mothers of the children (we have gone well over three-fourths). About seven hundred thousand are blind, 100 thousand are fathers in the situations, who ~~and~~ are either mentally or physically incapacitated. Sixty thousand out of eight million are able bodied men. I haven't worked those percentages, but just put sixty over ~~the top of~~ eight and add all those zeroes, and you begin to get an idea that it is a rather small percentage. ~~Okay,~~ Let's move from the ~~that kind of~~ statistical description, which I hope will give us at least a partially common background to talk about three terms that have been used by ~~those~~ people who are studying poverty.

One term is that there is a ~~such a thing as the~~ "cycle of poverty." I am sure that many of you have heard this ~~that~~. Another is that there is a ~~kind of~~ "culture of poverty." Then a third term, or rather a concept, claims ~~matter has to do with the fact~~ that we really know better than to say that these problems are just the problems of individuals. Indeed, they are problems that are part of our system, governmental system, economic system, however you want to describe them. In other words, they might be called systems problems.

Each of these is not such a difficult concept, at least the way that I deal with them. The "cycle of poverty" means something like this: you get, somehow, started in poverty and one thing adds to another and you have a hard time ever breaking out. Example: you grew up an oversized family with a low income, education of lesser quality than that of many other people. When you go out work, you have a serious problem if (a). your old man never made it far enough so that he could tell you where to go to find a good job, (b). when you finally you lacked the training and education to get it. You not only have that problem, you have the problem after you have tried long enough, hard enough, you begin to suspect that you are not going to make it. Your own expectations go down. school teacher, adequate educational support back in the home, too many kids, and poor people anyhow.

The chances of your really being encouraged are rather slim. Indeed, the way that teacher reacts may be read by the individual as, "she expects me to fail." In any case, all I am saying is each of these things build on other and add to problem. Suppose low income means poor health, and that is what it does mean in our society, doesn't it? ~~Percentage wise~~ In terms of percentages, if your income is low, your health care ~~is down.~~ level of low. You can look at any index and you will find out that this is the case. Sure you know some individuals who are poor and very healthy. So do I. I know some sick rich people, but the averages, the percentages ~~we are talking about~~ show that if the income is low, then health is poor. What are the chances of adequate performance on a job if your health is poor. Alright, these things sort of thrown together begin to give you the idea of the cycle of poverty. I think that I already have intimated it, but let me make perfectly clear that this is not something that just applies to the adults ~~you see~~ that are already there, but it begins to entrap the children, the children of the children, and Lord knows, it traps the children of the children of the children. ~~in this same kind of situation.~~

~~Okay~~ Now, a few words about the "culture of poverty." It has become somewhat popular to talk as if people who ~~were~~ are poor develop special ~~kinds of~~ ways of relating to the world and to each other, and that indeed, this gave them a culture that is different somehow from the main stream. We live in ~~the kind of~~ a society where there are a lot of different sub-cultures ~~of one sort or another.~~ Where I live in Atlanta, Georgia, it is different from Indianapolis. There have been some people in Atlanta who have said, "thank goodness," but there have also been some people in Indianapolis who have said, "thank goodness." We all get sort of tied into what we know and what we like. Yes, we ~~do~~ have ~~certain kinds of~~ differences, but what we usually forget is that, overwhelmingly, what we have ~~alike~~ in common is many, many more times important than the ~~kinds of~~ differences, ~~that we have.~~

We sometimes have looked at poor people and have seen what the social scientists call traits. Certain habits, certain ways of behaving, and sometimes we fail to ask how ~~we~~ they got into that behavior pattern, is that the way they meant to behave, is this really built into a psychological orientation to life in some way? Go back to the health problem to just give you an example. If you are poor, the chances are that your diet is inadequate and your health is bad. If either the health is bad or the diet is bad, you are likely to come up with some other symptoms like low energy, ~~if not actually sick~~. Now if you see a poor person moping about, even though on the job, does this mean that here is someone who has grown up where energetic work is not important, so therefore don't do it, or does it mean that he isn't really able to do it? ~~don't you see~~. Well, I dare say that we have got some of each. I think that if we were to play the percentages again, we would find that ~~the combination of~~ ~~both and~~ not having the ~~kind~~ lack of education or training ~~that~~ fails ~~did build~~ to build in certain attitudes towards work is important. But we ~~even more importantly, because~~ ~~we~~ sometimes just plain forget the physical side of it, ~~is that~~ the lack of diet, the history of disease, ~~etc., also enters~~ that is also ~~into this situation~~ very important. ~~I~~ Let me move quickly ~~from that~~ to talk about some of the problems that are in the system. ~~I will try to make these quick and simple, and still give you some idea of what is involved~~. If you look at our whole society and ask the question, "who gets what and when," you don't always come up with the answer that there is an even ~~kind of~~ distribution of the benefits of the society, do you? You ask who gets the money? ~~we don't~~ And we know that we do not take the total pot of the ~~gnend~~ gross national product, ~~the gross national product~~ and divide it by two hundred million souls, and split it up, ~~do we?~~ ~~So we are used to not making it, even on that score~~. If you stop and ask about other things: who gets the best police protection, who gets the best attention from the fire fighters and fire fighting apparatus, who gets the best education, I think then we usually find that there is something less than an even, ~~or~~ fair, or equitable distribution of these ~~kinds of~~ services. Are these services important to all people in our society, including those who ~~that~~ are poor? ~~To~~ Take only ~~the one of~~ education. ~~I think~~ We have already seen that it ~~the~~ education is second best, or third best, the chances of breaking out of poverty ~~what they are already in~~ is reduced by that much. What about such things as job security? What kinds of jobs provide security? Well, out in the private employment field, (a), you have ~~got~~ to be in an industry that is going to make it, and (b), it helps a good bit if you have a union. In public employment, since that has been rising in most areas recently and I think that it should continue to rise and I welcome that personally, as a matter of fact. You may have certain forms of job security, but it depends substantially ~~a good bit~~ in both cases on matters ~~things~~ that are beyond the individual's immediate control. The tendency ~~in our society~~ is that the lower ~~down~~ you are on the economic ladder, the less job security you have. Who needs ~~that~~ job security most? Me? I have held a number of different jobs ~~a bad job record~~, but I really don't need ~~that~~ security as much as a man at the low end of the economic scale. There are other ~~kinds of~~ ~~questions~~ issues. Lower level jobs frequently are the ~~Many jobs are at the low end of the~~ ~~first group and~~ wiped out if there is an economic recession or a serious technological change. We sometimes look at people who have been impoverished ~~sat down~~, ~~maybe at~~ in certain local communities, or rural areas ~~maybe out in a rural area for years and we~~ ~~say how come~~ ask why don't they ~~don't~~ move? Part of the answer may relate to how they feel about "place". But you know that if I want another job, ~~and~~ or even if I am forced to get another job, the chances are ~~pretty~~ good that I can figure where to go to get one; and once I have figured it out, those folks will pay me to come and talk to them. You never pay a poor man to come someplace to talk about a job in our society. ~~and if he did have to go some distance and take his family~~ Can you imagine an ordinary laborer, going some distance with his family ~~for instance, one not working in construction work~~, being offered his expenses to move himself and his family? Yet I don't move unless I can bargain something about some money to get me from where I am to where I want to go. So we have built-in privileges for folks like me and like some of you and we have built-in sort of disadvantages for other kinds of folks. We have mentioned education and training, let's ~~throw up on quick other matter~~ connect briefly on transportation.

~~If you look at~~ In many of our major cities you will find that the transportation routes, whether they be for automobiles or for mass transit ~~or for other forms of public transportation,~~ favor in many ways those who not only need it the least, but used it the least, and ~~yet,~~ thereby serve ~~those~~ inadequately those with the greatest need. ~~it does not adequately serve those who probably pay the brunt of the cost of running the transportation system.~~

~~I think that~~ There are other things that should be said ~~along with~~ about the ~~this business of~~ ~~systematic~~ systemic problems... I ~~guess one more.~~ let me settle for one more. Are there jobs ~~there~~ for people to have? Fortunately, we long ago learned that just because a man wanted to work, it did not necessarily mean that he could work. There either might not be a job for him or, ~~to express it more accurately,~~ no job for which he was considered qualified. If this is really beyond the individual's control, then do we accept that there are some general social responsibilities, ~~or~~ public responsibilities, for ~~it?~~ meeting this situation?

I have spent all this time talking about some facts and figures, and on ~~about~~ three concepts related to ~~about~~ poverty, trying to bring us ~~get us~~ to some common understanding of what is involved. ~~what some of the background.~~ Let me now ask ~~the~~ this question, "why should we be concerned about this issue at all?" I would like to take this ~~essentially in~~ two parts. One is, why should we be concerned in general, ~~just~~ as citizens and members of the society. And the other is, why is it of interest or important to people involved in public employment, whether as employees or managers. ~~they be involved as employees or as public managers.~~

First ~~of all~~, the general reasons. ~~and~~ You can almost rattle them off. I will give you the first two, which are ~~kind of~~ somewhat moralistic or idealistic. I think they're important so I will put them first. You may not think they are important ~~or~~ and you can throw them out. ~~as far as I am concerned~~. I might like you better if you didn't, but you may. One is that if you see basic human need, ~~that is probably enough to say,~~ we ought to do something about it. Secondly, just as a matter of fairness, how are things handled in the society? How are people treated? If unfairly, why not do something about it? Okay, you can throw those two out of the way. The third one is, ~~and I suggest to you, is~~ that the better off all our people are, the more stable our economy will be, so thereby the better off we are. Poor people immediately spend the money ~~that~~ they get. Contrary to whatever you may think, they usually spend it on what is most necessary to them. ~~and~~ In most cases, I would say that it is for them to ~~they are the ones to~~ say what is necessary. ~~to them rather than me~~. For some of them, maybe a T.V. set is the best thing that could happen to them, maybe not. But for most of them, it goes for housing or for food or for clothes. If they buy those things, those of us who work elsewhere, including public employment, are better off. If you are a public employee, then the answer is almost as simple. If they earn more, they pay more taxes; if they pay more taxes, at least you have something to bargain ~~fight for, or~~ about. If the taxes are not paid, then there is nothing ~~not even anything~~ to squabble over. The fourth reason is that I think by solving the problem ~~taking care~~ of a segment of the population considered poor, that we stand a much better chance of reducing social unrest. People who have been affiliated with the labor movement, like some of you, are ~~kind of~~ in favor of some forms of social unrest. You are usually more in favor of it if it looks ~~like~~ as if it is going to help you out, than if somebody else is doing it. Maybe ~~that~~ it is part ~~of the~~ of human ~~animal~~ nature to respond that way.

I guess all I am saying here is that ~~if~~ where there is a problem, I stand firmly on the proposition that people should complain. If they need to organize for their complaints, so much the better, let's do that. But I also would like to stand on the proposition that we all ought to have sense enough to construct a society that reduces the number of complaints. ~~We won't get rid of all of them, I guess, thank goodness for that too, you know. It would be a dull life if there were no problems. If the teachers and the school superintendent never had any friction, where would we be? It would be a dull world. The superintendents would resign.~~ [If we fail in this we can expect further troubles. It is not dissimilar to paying adequate attention to public services. If we do not understand the problems and provide money we can expect a breakdown. Similarly if we do not work to overcome public employee difficulties we can expect troubles.]

~~You can take a vote on that on your own caucus later.~~ The fact that ~~they~~ public employees are going to give ~~you~~ public managers more problems than ~~you~~ they want ~~in~~ for the next few years is something that I was about to say maybe you deserve. I would say quite honestly and I think this applies to the police, to fire fighters, to all of us...the society deserves. If we don't pay adequate attention to problems that fire fighters have or that police have, well, indeed school superintendents have or teachers have. It is not just those folks that are having trouble. Indeed, when they make serious mistakes--this can happen with any of us. Those folks should not be blamed so much as all of us together should be blamed.

The fifth reason ~~as to~~ why we should be concerned is that there is ~~some~~ a cost involved if we are not concerned. I suggest to you that we never adequately figure the cost of not doing something. We sometimes figure fairly closely the cost ~~of what it would be to do something.~~ of doing a particular thing.

For instance, the figures have ranged up to twenty billion dollars as to what it would cost ~~if you gave~~ to give every ~~person~~ family that was below thirty six hundred dollars, enough to bring them up ~~to that and a little bit more.~~ close to that minimal figure. But we have not turned around ~~really~~ and calculated what the continuing welfare cost, ~~and how long they will go, what~~ the losses in taxes, will be, what the health cost, ~~what~~ the crime cost, and ~~what~~ the cost of other forms of social breakdowns might be if we fail to eliminate poverty. It seems to me that as a practical people, ~~that the American public, above all else, is supposed to be pragmatic. That~~ we ought to sit back and think about how much it will cost us not to do it. I said that I would give ~~some~~ further reasons why we should be concerned ~~about this and~~ about remedying poverty and relate them to public employees and, indeed, I think ~~also to~~ public management.

One reason, and since I am from Atlanta where sanitation workers are out on strike and about ready to go into their twentieth day, is that there is a fair number of public employees in this country, federal, state, southern states, and other states, who are themselves poor. Maybe none of you represent such employees, but they are there. They belong to at least some of the unions represented here. They belong in ~~the~~ occupations covered by some of the managements that are represented here. So ~~that~~ This is ~~kind of the number~~ one self-interest, practical reason: our own people may be directly involved in poverty situations.

A second ~~one~~ is that many of you, ~~indeed most public employees,~~ deal with poor people. We have been going under, ~~when we~~, as a nation, ~~have been undergoing some changing~~ a change in attitude toward those who are poor. I have suggested to you tonight, I hope, that we have not gone far enough ~~and that I think that all of us still~~ that we need to continue to change. ~~our attitudes~~. Also the poor citizen, our clients if you like, our constituents, have begun to change their ideas about themselves. I think that, at the very least ~~on a minimum~~, this affects teachers, public school superintendents, welfare caseworkers, ~~and~~ welfare department heads, and ~~all~~ the various aspects of the employment services. It certainly, in a ~~very~~ crucial way, affects police, ~~and~~ fire fighters, public health services and let's add sanitation services and others as well. Then as a kind of final reason why public employees and administrators should be interested in the problems, there is a whole new thrust related to employment opportunity. Indeed, some of you already may ~~have already~~ been participating in such programs as a way of providing meaningful employment for those people who are at the lower end of the scale. There efforts have been known as "new careers" ~~to develop what has been called the "new careers" concept, or to use some other terms,~~ or the development of a "sub-professional" ~~role~~ or a "para ~~talent~~-professional" role, or as somebody said recently, a "new professional" role. Just to give one example, teachers who have teacher's aides, ~~for instance,~~ may be engaged in a ~~some~~ process of this sort.

So having gone through some of the facts, having talked about why be concerned, let me give you a ~~kind of~~ final argument ~~which is not meant to discourage you from asking questions when that time comes--and that time~~ will come. I would like briefly to compare the situation that we are in today to the situation that we were in during the 1930's. I want to do this for a rather special reason, and that is to show how we make use of our public power, and how we make use of the resourses of the nation to cure problems. ~~Now most of you are not as old as I am, so let me tell you this.~~

In the 1930's the depression made a serious challenge to our ideas about economic security. We used to have a great philosophy. Indeed, it was such a great philosophy that it reached the heights of being a myth. ~~and~~ It was that anybody ~~that~~ who wanted to make out in our society could make out. Anybody who wanted to work, could work. We found sometime in the beginning of the fall of 1929 that some rather well-placed, well-educated, well-heeled people were having the same kinds of trouble that some poor, worn-down heeled folks were having. They could not find work and they had been told to save their money, and they had, of then the banks went broke and all the things that we thought led to economic security somehow turned around on us. At least for a while a majority of the nation thought about this problem in a serious way. With some folks, not unlike yourselves, out there screaming in the streets on occasion, and marching up and down and being, in general, rather obnoxious and hateful, But with new ~~a certain form of~~ political leadership, and I might add with some good solid academic ideas, they began to put through certain ~~kinds of~~ reforms that were important for guaranteeing a limited ~~certain kinds of~~ economic security. Let me mention just a few.

We ~~You~~ passed unemployment compensation laws, ~~and~~ a national act which meant that if you had a job, then got thrown out of it ~~the job~~, you could get some payment while you were out, ~~until you could go back~~. We passed a social security act ~~provision~~ which had many things in it, but one was that when you become ~~got up to age~~ 65 you could quit work and get something. We also passed a ~~kind of~~ law that said if a bank has a run on it and it is going to go broke and you have money in there but ~~and~~ you are not going to lose it, ~~all~~. We insured it ~~We are going to insure it~~. We did ~~some~~ other things. We passed a National Labor Relations Act that said if you ~~do certain things like~~ convince 51% of the people that a union is not a bad idea, we will tell the employer that he has to bargain with you; and indeed, he has to bargain with you in what is called "good faith." ~~We have had some trouble with that term. Fortunately, in public employment we have never had that problem, though in any case some difficulties, but nevertheless, there was a law.~~ If you stop and think about it, all of this together ~~this~~ was like a revolution. It was certainly extensive reform. It came about because it was squeezed and shaken out of our political system. It didn't come easy, didn't come graciously, and it didn't come just because some people on high said we should have it. Think about one other thing: all of those reforms really relate to people who are already ~~sort of~~ rather fully in~~to~~ the system. It is what I guess we would call, ~~now because I am still essentially in favor of most of these schemes,~~ protection for the working middle class. ~~In other words~~ But on the other hand, if you are poor and don't have a job or have the wrong kind of job, you are not even covered by unemployment compensation. Indeed, you might not ~~even be~~ even be covered by workmen's compensation, in case you were injured on ~~the~~ the job.

Although we have broadened social security tremendously ~~for~~ over the years, if you weren't in ~~the right kind of~~ certain occupation, you weren't covered by social security. So that when you got to 65, you were still poor and, obviously, if you weren't rich enough to put money in the bank, the federal deposit insurance is not going to help you one whit. We were willing to do that kind of shaking of the system in the '30's to protect people who are essentially like most of us or like many of our forebears.

What I am suggesting is that as good as those reforms were, we now have new, unmet needs for those who are poor in our society. Those needs affect all of us. We have good self-interest reasons, as well as the moral and idealistic reasons, to ~~try and~~ attempt to change the situation of roughly, one-fifth of our population, which is not economically secure and therefore, cannot be socially secure. If you ask me what difference it would make in its broadest terms, I think it goes something like this: ~~that~~ it depends, really, on what kind of a society you want. If you want to be part of it, and if you want it to be one of justice, of peace, of security, and of happiness, I think that we have to go in the direction of guaranteeing the benefits of our kind of life to the total population.

I thank you very much.

Dear Dr. Emery:

At long last I am able to submit a transcript of the speech you gave at our spring conference. The elaborate playback equipment required for this job was in short supply, and we had to work our way up a five-month waiting list. Sorry for the delay.

I hope that the publication of the proceedings will now move along very rapidly. We can handle your article in several different ways: (1) you may completely edit your own transcript; (2) you may edit the transcript for errors of fact or wording, and turn the grammatical stuff over to us for professional editing; or (3) if the content looks good, you can simply give us a go-ahead on editing. Please let me know your preference.

Unless you do your own editing, you need not return the transcript. Thanks for your cooperation.

Sincerely,

Dale

This important matter is on my mind: There is a teaching film on a Negro hero. Now available, it will open every student's eyes to contributions to American history made by Negro Americans.

It is a carefully-researched, thoroughly appealing film about Frederick Douglass, the great runaway slave who had dared learn to read and write, and who took the extreme personal risk of publicly announcing that he was a fugitive slave, and then of denouncing his Abolitionist keepers for encouraging the secession of the slave states.

> "I believe," he says, "that if the South were to be allowed to secede, we in the North would thus have abandoned every slave on this continent!"

So great has the demand grown for this particular film -- one in the series Profiles in Courage based on President John F. Kennedy's book -- that it now is No. 1 on our own best sellers list of 26 Profiles.

I commend this filmed biography of Frederick Douglass for ownership by your schools as one of the most powerful, most direct statements yet made on this great Negro in American history.

Sincerely,

Robert Saudek

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Frederick Douglass played by Robert Hooks in the PROFILES IN COURAGE series.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS, NEGRO HERO, BECOMES SCHOOLS' MOST POPULAR FILM

The film on the American Negro hero, Frederick Douglass, has reached the top of the PROFILES IN COURAGE best sellers list, Robert Saudek, Executive Producer of the film series, based on John F. Kennedy's Pulitzer prize winning book, announced today.

"Frederick Douglass" is the story of the runaway slave who understood that learning to read and write was the pathway to freedom and became well versed in Shakespeare and Voltaire. He eventually dared to announce publicly that he was a fugitive slave and gave his true name when his story was challenged. Stating, "The man who cannot speak the truth of himself is not truly free," Douglass published his autobiography, and risked recapture for the sake of the freedom to fight for the rights of Negroes.

"These examples of past courage," John F. Kennedy wrote, "can teach, they can offer hope, they can provide inspiration..."

By reaching the top of the best sellers list, Frederick Douglass has joined the ranks of such traditional schoolroom heroes as Daniel Webster, John Adams and Woodrow Wilson.

The film is distributed by I Q Films Inc. sole distributor for Robert Saudek Associates. Schools desiring further information about the films of the entire PROFILES IN COURAGE series first shown on NBC should write to: I Q Films Inc., 689 Fifth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10022.

the birth of a tv cameraman

WANTED:

Trained TV News Cameraman. Should know equipment, editing, sound, lights and have good news sense. An Equal Opportunity Employer.

CALL CFWC

Contact Charles Jefferson, Job Placement Advisor of the Community Film Workshop Council, 17 West 60th Street, New York, New York 10023, (212) 247-3192.

THE COMMUNITY FILM WORKSHOP COUNCIL may be able to send you a recent graduate of its news cameraman training program, a rigorous session that used to last six weeks and now takes nine. The program is an Office of Economic Opportunity sponsored effort to give minority-group men and women the necessary training to qualify them for TV news staffs—and also to give television in this country a source of skilled people sensitive to minority interests and viewpoints.

The fifteen trainees of each session spend the entire period living and working as TV news cameramen—meeting deadlines, doing on-the-spot filming along with professionals from local and network crews, editing, narrating and then criticizing their results. This is done under the guidance

Ernest Dunkley, now at WCKT, Miami, shoots background for fashion report.

Another graduate from the first CFWC program: James McIver, now with ABC.

PAGINATION INCORRECT

of trained news pros such as NBC's Sandra Holmes, ABC's John Fletcher, Franke Tonello from Howard Lester Productions, New York freelancer Bruce Harding, Dick Wood and Bob Rubin, director of the workshop.

Training begins with silent 16-mm filming (Bolexes) and moves to sound (using Auricon equipment). The trainees live in the YMCA near their studio, handy for late-hour shooting, evening evaluation sessions, etc. Each trainee is paid $75 a week for the long hours and attends special screenings (Medium Cool and Midnight Cowboy, for example) as well as covering news events whenever they happen—parades, Moratorium Day, fashion shows.

A typical week (see page 36, Five Days' Log) will concentrate on particular equipment, while maintaining the news-filming routine. To work on the Auricon sound recording camera and portable quartz lighting equipment, for example, the class divided into four groups, four men on each: one on camera, one sound, one for lighting and correspondence duties, and one silent cameraman for cutaways. First day they familiarized themselves with the equipment; the second day was on-camera interviews indoors; the rest of the week was spent covering assignments taken from the UPI daily log. The correspondent for each team had the ultimate responsibility for that assignment. Duties were switched among the team each day.

So far the Workshop has graduated 26 trainees, placing 24 in TV stations around the nation. There are the usual problems of adjustment and occasional personnel conflicts to be faced by the trainees—but most have worked out well in their new situations.

Beginning this month the Workshop will train 45 more TV news cameramen—recruited from the young minority-group people with low incomes throughout the country, trained in New York or Chicago, and ready to step into skilled, responsible positions wherever they're needed.

CFWC—What is it?

The Community Film Workshop was formed in 1968 by the American Film Institute with a seed grant of $50,000, to help local film organizations recruit minority-group members. Within a year the Workshop had established itself as an active, independent body, setting up small film groups in many cities and engaging in such studies as one funded by the Ford Foundation, "to determine projected goals and trends of employment in the motion picture and TV industry and to correct any imbalance in the hiring of minorities in these industries."

The current training program began with a grant from the Office of Economic Opportunity awarded June 15, 1969. The funding supported two programs: One was the establishment of ten community film workshops throughout the country; the other was the training in two six-week cycles of a total of 30 poverty-level, non-white candidates to become news cameramen. Some of the recent trainees from the CFWC Workshop got their initial film experience at local community workshops established under the OEO grant.

Where else have the trainees come from? According to job placement advisor Charles Jefferson, it was hard to find them at first. OEO guidelines required that trainees have had annual incomes of less than $1600 net. CFWC standards required technical proficiency in photography and a willingness to relocate to any area of the country that they may be placed. Ads in trade press and word of mouth rounded up only nine young men eligible for the first training cycle. Now that the program has become better known, applications have increased. There were more than 80 trying for the 15 vacancies in the January 1971 program.

But placing even those nine was difficult—few TV station operators felt the six-week program could qualify a person for TV news work. While the trainees did perform well, their employers reported on weaknesses in their preparation—and the result has been the program's extension to nine weeks.

The training includes more than just how to operate equipment. Self-discipline and objectivity are stressed, according to Jefferson. "Being able to relate to people is important in the news field," he said, describing the philosophy behind the training program's approach to news reporting. Trainees have to work closely with one another in an atmosphere which emphasizes doing the job. "You can't let your personal hangups interfere," explained Jefferson, pointing out that an objective minority-group newsman would be able to give a different viewpoint to news items, one more attuned to the backgrounds of disadvantaged viewers in the community, members of minority groups whose interests and values are not familiar to white middle-class newsmen.

How have the trainees worked out? Generally quite well, judging from employer letters and follow-up done by CFWC personnel. Most went to small community TV stations—George Williams, for example, started January 1970 as an editor at WSOC-TV, Charlotte, North Carolina. Now he is a news photographer, shoots, edits and does stand-ups.

But there have been some problems. Prejudice from station personnel has affected a few trainees; some stations have abused the trainees—keeping them on for appearance's sake. "I don't want to find one of my people pushing a broom," Jefferson says. He has had to trouble-shoot in situations where stations have relegated CFWC-trained newsmen to covering occasional token "Black" news events. "We don't want our trainees hired because they're from a minority-group," Jefferson tells prospective employers. "We want them hired because they're competent news photographers."

Five Days' Log

This excerpt from a CFWC Workshop Log last year covers training done near the beginning of the six-week session—working with silent filming techniques. The 1971 programs will last nine weeks, will add work in night shooting and concentrate in speedy editing, more editorial evaluation.

Monday Feb. 2, 1970—The trainees covered the Black Panther demonstration at the Criminal Court Building in Manhattan and the New York Harbor Tug Boat Strike. They returned in the afternoon and started to edit their stories. We had a screening at 3:30 of the rushes followed by the air show. Most of the edited stories went over the 30-second limit. The trainees are balking at the time limit and are reluctant to throw away good footage, even though it does nothing to enhance the finished story. There was a heated discussion on the necessity of conforming to rules of time, etc.

Sandy [Holmes] stayed after the air show to help two of the trainees with editing techniques.

Tuesday, Feb. 3, 1970—Because of inclement weather the trainees stayed in today and worked with their new meters, editing, testing cameras, etc. In the afternoon we screened dailies and edited stories. The results were not extremely encouraging.

In the late afternoon Shirley MacLaine visited the program and we again screened the air show for that evening. Miss MacLaine engaged in discussion with the trainees and staff drawing on her experience in film and what she feels to be the new trend in the movie industry regarding young film makers. We discussed the national and international implications of news reporting and how the news in other countries differs from the coverage in the United States. She emphasized the necessity for the views and feelings of new young newsmen and urged the trainees to use the skills that they learn in the program to tell the real story of their own people and to help their people get fair representation in the news media.

Wednesday, Feb. 4, 1970—As an outgrowth of the discussion from the evening before, the trainees were asked to cover a story on Black people in Times Square. A few protested the assignment, saying that it was a punishment for airing their views the night before, but the staff felt that it would be a good exercise in seeing the diverse ways that a single subject in a familiar location can be photographed.

The dailies were screened and the edited shows followed. The show this evening was exceptionally good and the editing showed a lot of thought on the part of the trainees. Even the discussion seemed to be more relevant than usual and there was less "nit picking" and more concentration on the elements of good news coverage. The staff felt that the trainees had really reached a turning point in their training and would hopefully carry through the energy and high level displayed in tonight's show until the end of the program.

Thursday, Feb. 5, 1970—Les Dennis, producer of the Eleventh Hour News on NBC, visited the trainees this morning. He viewed the air show from the night before to get an idea of the kind of work the trainees have been doing. He spoke to the trainees mainly on narrations; how to best judge your own time, how to pare down your spot sheet; how narration should add to, not illustrate, the pictures on the screen. (Stay away from the Grizzly Bear.)

There was editing in the afternoon. Some visitors from OEO came to see the training center. Mel Good and Bob Rodwin from ABC visited in the late afternoon and viewed the air show. After the show, Mr. Rodwin spoke to the trainees. Mr. Good will return next week to speak to them more at length.

Friday, Feb. 6, 1970—The sound cameras will be delivered today so the trainees will stay at home base to edit and get the equipment ready for return. We screened the dailies from the Panther rally and the Tug strike. The shooting was, for the most part, exceptionally good.

In the afternoon some of the trainees edited their stories and the others were checked out on the new Auricon sound cameras.

We had the air show and discussion at 5 o'clock and the stories were good. The narrations are still weak and need more work by the trainees.

Dear Mr. Frazier:

Because of my deep concern for increased articulation and participation of the minority viewpoint in the communications industry, I have watched with great interest the programs and activities of the Community Film Workshop Council (CFWC) as they have related to the training and employment of the disadvantaged.

In particular, I want to congratulate you on your Television News Cameraman Training Program, which is obviously filling a need too long ignored. The effectiveness of any job training program,of course, is measured by the degree of employment achieved by its trainees and CFWC should certainly be proud of its record of ninety per cent employment of its first training cycle.

I have also been apprised of CFWC's laudable apprenticeship program, directed at a specific industry deficiency, which supplied talented young men and women to such productions as "Cotton Comes to Harlem," "Angel Levine," and other films. In addition, the support and encouragement given by CFWC to film workshops in disadvantaged communities throughout the country has done much to teach a new and powerful means of communication to groups that have grown distrustful of traditional forms of communication.

For these ongoing programs, and others in the planning stages, I would like to convey my heartiest endorsement and best wishes for CFWC's continued success.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Frazier:

Thank you and Mr. Poitier for your letter of February third inviting me to attend the graduation of 16 TV news camerman from the Community Film Workshop on Friday, February twenty-seventh.

Unfortunately, I will be in Washington, D.C. on that day and therefore, unable to accept your kind invitation. However, I have asked Mr. John Silvera, Deputy Director, Office of Community Services to represent me.

The Community Film Workshop Council must be commended for its successful efforts on behalf of minority group members. Teaching productive skills and the process of job placement, are basic steps in achieving social mobility for minorities.

I am most grateful for your thought of me and truly sorry that I cannot be with you on this most worthwhile occasion.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

16 YOUNG MEN SET FOR CAREERS IN TV

2d Class Is Graduated by O.E.E.-Funded Council

By FRED FERRETTI

Sixteen young men from near-poverty backgrounds were graduated yesterday by the Community Film Workshop Council following their completion of a six-week course in the techniques of television journalism.

The men, all in their 20's, are from New York and other areas in the East, from Appalachia, the Middle West and California. Most are black, one is white and several are Puerto Rican; one is an American Indian, another an Oriental. Most of them have already been placed in jobs with public and commercial television stations in the South and the Middle West.

The sixteen represent the second graduating class of the Community Film Workshop Council here, which grew from a project seeded by the American Film Institute and funded by the Federal Office of Economic Opportunity.

The young men, in the course of their training by a freelance cinematographer, Bruce Harding; two film editors, Sandra Holmes of the National Broadcasting Company and Franke Tonello, and a cameraman, John Fletcher of the American Broadcasting Company, actually shot breaking news stories in New York's streets. After the film was developed, the students cut and edited it and wrote the scripts. They operated lighting and sound equipment as well as cameras.

Help From Industry

According to the executive director of the Community Film Workshop Council, Clifford Frazier, "the industry has been good to us." He said that laboratories, including the DuArt film labs, whose loft space the training program used, developed their film at discount rates; that raw film stock was provided at cut rates; that photographic and recording equipment was rented at half price.

The results came yesterday. The sixteen received diplomas and bronzed 16-millimeter film cans engraved with their names. On hand for the ceremonies were the president of the A.B.C. network, Leonard Goldenson; the actress, Ruby Dee and the director Arthur Penn.

While the young men trained, they were paid $75 a week. Charles Jefferson, the council's placement director, said that the touching aspect of the program came as one of the men, David Adams of Whitesburg, Ky., deep in Appalachia, "came to be accepted by his black brothers." "He had never seen a black face until he came here," Mr. Jefferson added.

Mr. Frazier made a speech, and so did Miss Dee. So did Mr. Harding and Mr. Jefferson. So did Robert Geller of the American Film Institute. Then Gary Brewer was asked to come up to face the 100 invited guests who crowded the working loft on West 55th Street.

Mr. Brewer is a graduate of the council's first training cycle. He works at A.B.C. He was rather shy.

"I just want to say that A.B.C. is one of the better networks," he said. "And as soon as we get a little more of the brothers in there, we'll straighten things out." He got the best hand of the day.

A training ground for disadvantaged

With its first graduates now placed at stations, workshop grooms bigger lot

A year ago, Caverly Stringer was pushing a broom in his home town of Mamaroneck, N.Y., for $30 a week.

Last week, KERA-TV Dallas, on its Newsroom show, featured a couple of film clips shot by a 19-year-old TV news cameraman who had joined the staff last Jan. 5. His name: Caverly Stringer.

The road from Mamaroneck to an educational station in Dallas was paved for Mr. Stringer, a boy from an underprivileged black family, by the Community Film Workshop Council in New York. The council is paving similar roads for Puerto Rican, Indian, and other minorities.

The council, funded by the Office of Economic Opportunity, has established seven film workshops in the U.S.—in New York; Washington; Los Angeles; San Francisco; Hartford, Conn.; Tulare county, Calif.; Whitesville, Ky.; and San Juan, P.R. The goal of each is to spot promising members of minority groups for possible careers as TV or film cameramen, soundmen, newswriters or editors.

The council's first New York class was graduated last fall. Caverly Stringer was a member. Seven of his eight classmates were just as successful in winning jobs at TV stations throughout the country. The other chose to become a feature-film technician. Score: 100%. The other graduates who are now at stations are: Luis Vale, WAVE-TV Louisville, Ky.; Joel Fletcher, WTVJ(TV) Miami; James McIver, WMAL-TV Washington; Leon Collins, noncommercial WETA(TV) Washington; Hector Nieves and Bary Brewer, ABC-TV New York; and George Williams, WSOC-TV Charlotte, N.C.

The number of candidates attending the council's New York school depends on the amount of money in the till. OEO's intial grant to the program last June was $400,000—enough to complete the first-cycle class and the second one, comprising 16 candidates, which is to be graduated Friday (Feb. 27).

The CWFC workshop in New York is no picnic. Each candidate is paid $75 a week and attends classes five days a week, eight hours a day for six weeks at the DuArt Labs. Teachers are Bruce Harding, news photographer and cinematographer, who is training director; John Fletcher, ABC news cameraman; Sandra Holmes, on leave as news editor from NBC; and Franke Tonello, a film editor with Howard Lester Productions Inc.

The Community Film Workshop Council grew from the American Film Institute, which Cliff Frazier, CFWC executive director, calls the "father of the organization—but not really paternal." The CWFC, he stresses, operates autonomously.

In July 1968, actor Sidney Poitier and director George Stevens Jr. recognized the need for more feature-film technicians from minority groups. So, with a $50,000 grant from a couple of foundations, the program was formulated.

Then last June the OEO became interested, and the emphasis shifted from feature-film production to TV news filmmaking—where the need for minority-group hiring proved even greater.

"The medium [TV] is the best avenue to establish contact between all people," says Mr. Frazier. "It's meaningful, direct communication."

And, he adds, "If these young men are motivated to commit themselves to learn new skills, our hope is to place them all." As of next Friday he will have 16 to place. The address of the Community Film Workshop Council is 17 West 60th Street, New York.

Dear Station Manager:

On February 27th, the New York Times carried a story on an exciting graduation exercise for 16 highly competent and previously economically disadvantaged T. V. news cameramen.

On February 23rd, Broadcasting magazine featured on page 69 an article which descibed the T. V. News Cameramen Program, its origins and its candidates. Both pieces are included for your reading.

As of Wednesday, March 11th, there were still 10 qualified young men who had not been placed. This distressing number - despite energetic publicity, qualified graduates and close communication with the T. V. industry.

We're sure a previous lack of response resulted from communication gaps and not from any unwillingness to provide T. V. newscasting with the professionalism, the objectivity and balance of reporting it must continue to perpetuate.

A Young Black Film Maker's View

by Bill Hudson

It is 1970 and more and more people are isolating themselves from one another; building walls of religion, skin color, striped ties, hair styles, employment and sex. It is this isolation that will cause man to lose the challenge presented to himself by his very existence: to achieve the delicate balance of individual freedom and social responsibility necessary for the fulfillment of the promise of mankind: to become civilized.

To become civilized, to break through the walls of ignorance and prejudice embedded in fear, man must communicate. Man must communicate to destroy the psychotic need of some humans to think themselves superior to others. Man must communicate to destroy man's lack of feeling for the plight of his fellow man. Man must communicate to destroy the stupid selfishness that allows us to kill other men in the name of God. And finally, and of the utmost importance, man must communicate to destroy the insanity that allows us to "profit" on the misery of others; while thinking that we are getting something for nothing, when in reality, we are paying the highest price possible . . . our existence.

As we approach 1984, no one is more conscious of the impact of communications on the growth of man towards becoming civilized than the film librarian. The Minorities Film Workshop addressed itself very directly to the communications problem in the U.S.A. It provided a fine opportunity for the white film librarian to gain perspective on the minority film maker.

It was distressing to observe that the majority of librarians in attendance were not at all prepared to deal with the film makers. There was entirely too much unjustified praise of the films presented and not enough incisive questioning of the film makers. The response of the audience sounded like an elementary school classroom. I heard a lot of "little Johnnies" and "little Marys" stand up and tell the teacher that they "liked" the films.

I also heard a great deal of talk about films "designed to promote discussion." After listening to the content of the "discussion" of those present, I wonder if they understand that "discussion" does not mean talking "about" a film but an inspection of the ideas, if any, presented in that film. For the Blacks of an audience to say as they did that a film is "bullshit" and the whites to say it isn't "bullshit" is a bullshit discussion; not a discussion of the film. Ironically the most talked about film (and to talk about does mean to talk around) was a film made by a non-Black person about a Black person's attitudes towards whites.

Whether a person can make a definitive film about cultures other than his own, I feel, depends on whether or not that person is a genius or not. Making a film on a culture different from yours is an extremely difficult talk. Even to make a film about the life of your own grandparents is a task that the average film maker is not equipped to do. Because before any film maker of quality is a documentarian or feature film director, he is an artist. He may be a commercial communicator or an aesthetic creator. He is still an artist involved in communicating to other human beings. The same basic communicative principles that apply to the other arts apply also to film—particularly to film because film uses all of the other arts.

What determines what an artist communicates? The life he has lived as distilled by his personality. If he has not lived the life of an American Indian, he cannot truly communicate that life style. The only way to communicate a life style exterior to your own is via immersion in that culture. Interviews and research are not enough. How many years of your life are you willing to give to really know a culture not your own? Commentary on cultures foreign to your own requires a unique talent that only a chosen few possess. Most of us mistake sympathy and appreciation for empathy and understanding.

The minds of human beings receive information in a standard manner. Black minds are no different than Chinese minds. The relative weight given information by the human being will change not only according to the cultural background of the receptor but also depends a great deal on the intellectual capability of the person involved. I have seen East Indian films about old men, Japanese films about old men and white American films about old men. True, old men are old men, but I was not able to understand the nuances of the Japanese or East Indian old men, but neither was I able to understand those of the white American old men. And if you are Hungarian neither could you understand the subtleties of the old men, if the old men were Italian. But this is all perfectly correct and as it should be, and, except for a few exceptional minds in the world who have the talent to grasp the guts of many cultures, most of us only get out of life what we put into it.

If you live in a country and study the culture of that country, you will hear very clearly the double "t" of the Japanese "matte" or the double "r" of the Spanish "perro". The hinderance to objective looks at America being that though you as white people live here in the U.S.A. you are not willing to really study your own culture. There exists a self-denigrating fear of the truth (which is not always that bad) which prevents white America from accurately presenting white American history. White American history is fused with the American Indian's history, the Chicano's history, the Black American's history and the Puerto Rican's history (to mention a few). It is because of this fusion that the facts are constantly hidden. The saddest part of this whole business being, that it is not only the exposure of the minorities ties with the white American's history that is feared by the white American, but his own white forefathers (relationships) with other white men, who did whatever they did in making America what it is today. Therefore white Americans feel they are able to "understand" a Truffaut or an Antonioni better than a white American, a John Huston and most certainly a Black American, Bill Hudson.

As a group, white America has denied the realities of life for so long that they now are able to even "wonder" at the young people's outrage at the corruptness of their elders. The Black man in America, on the other hand, has had an overdose of reality. We have known about the machinations of those in power legally and those in power illegally for a long time. Fifteen years ago my teenage buddies died from heroin. I am quite used to watching a brown paper bag being handed to a uniformed policeman. I am also quite used to entire neighborhoods of thousands of people knowing more about crime in their area than the alleged forces of "law and order".

The problem of prejudice, stemming from fear of your fellow man, will only begin to be solved when those in power realize that to properly gain from as simple a meeting as a Minority Film Workshop they must be ready and able to admit the errors of their forefathers, who were less civilized than themselves, and then face the present situation as an adult and do whatever is necessary to improve it. "Little Johnnies and Marys" are not going to better the situation one iota. Mankind needs adults.

The American Film Institute

THE COMMUNITY FILM WORKSHOP COUNCIL

OF THE

AMERICAN FILM INSTITUTE

In July of 1968 the American Film Institute provided $50,000 to establish an organization which became known as the Community Film Workshop Council. The group functions as a separete entity and organizes its own funding to supplement the seed grant from the American Film Institute. The CFWC concerns itself with film workshops throughout the country which are engaged in the use of motion picture and television as media of self-expression and which represents a potential job training ground for youth in the underprivileged areas of the United States.

PURPOSE

A growing number of film workshop programs have illustrated that filmmaking can be, at once, a constructive activity, a means of artistic expression and a device for releasing resources of individuals who previously had been unable to function effectively. The CFWC works to keep the workshops active and thriving and finds ways in which the productive resources of these young people can be channeled towards the mainstream of society.

PROGRAM

The Community Film Workshop Council

1. Serves as a coordinating organization through which workshops communicate with each other, with government and with industry.
2. Identifies sources of support and assists local workshops in securing such support.
3. Identifies employment opportunities in the film and television industry and provides special training to prepare individuals from workshops for these jobs.
4. Serves as a research instrument and source of information for agencies, both public and private, concerned with the development of human resources in underprivileged areas.

SPECIFIC ACTIVITIES

1. Identifies all existing film workshops, determines the scope of their activities, and forms a national membership.
2. Periodically publishes and circulates a directory and newsletter and maintains a personnel exchange listing.
3. Conducts seminars, forums, screenings and conferences to stimulate inter-activity between groups.
4. Evolves productive guidelines for existing and future workshops.
5. Advises workshops on specific sources of funding and, whenever possible, assists in the writing of applications.
6. Works with industry to identify job opportunities and, simultaneously, discovers and trains individuals from within the workshops who would be suitable candidates for these jobs.
7. Acts as a liaison between the community workshops and film industry groups to obtain professional advice and as assistance.

8. Determines existing sources of exhibition and distribution of workshop films. Catalogues film productions and seeks out new areas for their use.

9. Gives recognition to outstanding groups and individuals using the prestige of the AFI.

STRUCTURE

The Community Film Workshop Council of the American Film Institute was established as a non-profit, non-governmental membership corporation under the laws of the State of New York. It is national in scope and trustees have been selected to represent its national character.

The Community Film Workshop Council (CFWC) has been awarded a $675,000 Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) grant. This grant will be used by CFWC to develop talent and opportunities for minority and low-income filmmakers in the twin areas of film production and broadcasting.

This grant will enable CFWC to continue and expand the pilot Television Careers Training Program established last year and continue to expand the Workshop Program.

During the previous funding cycle, the Television Careers Training Program successfully trained and placed twenty-five young filmmakers as television news cameramen. During this same period the Workshop Program was expanded to include four new sites.

OEO's aim in awarding this grant was to create a vehicle for minority and low-income men and women to gain entry into the broadcast media.

The Television Careers Training Program will consist of three training cycles, each of nine weeks duration. Two of the training cycles will be conducted here in Manhattan and the third cycle will be held in Chicago. Each training cycle is structured to simulate actual television news operation.

During their training,the trainees will acquire basic interviewing techniques and the mechanical expertise necessary to function as professionals in the media. They will also be taught to recognize breaking news stories, how to film those stories, learn to edit their film to conform to existing formats and time restrictions, and to write the accompanying narration.

Highly qualified working professionals in the television news field will teach each training cycle.

The Workshop Program has been established to provide community based outlets for the burgeoning filmmaking activity of minority and low-income individuals. It will provide an opportunity for these individuals to acquire the basic skills in filmmaking. These workshops will be located at sites selected around the country to insure the maximum participation of the various ethnic and low income individuals for whom the program was devised.

In two timely, important new books a prominent Judge of the Civil Court of New York explores the duality of freedom and law in a democracy.

A thoughtful, probing—yet balanced—picture of how majority rule and minority rights under the constitution affect such pressing, controversial issues as race relations, ownership of firearms, censorship of the press, restriction of protest demonstrations, activities of organized labor, state aid to religious education, prayer in the public schools, rights of conscientious objectors, treatment of alcoholics and narcotics addicts, and virtually the entire litany of our present-day problems.

"It is significant that Sidney Asch has underscored civil responsibilities, as well as rights. Many people, old as well as young, seem very solicitous about their own rights and the responsibilities of others, but they look no further. Our American system rests on a mutuality of rights and duties."

Union-Made Film Evokes Emotional Response

Drug and Hospital Workers' Local Focuses on Rights

By PETER MILLONES

A drug and hospital union here has produced a kind of homemade movie with professional touches that is drawing emotional responses from union and nonunion members across the country.

The film, made by Local 1199 of the Drug and Hospital Employes Union, was originally designed only to show the union's 30,000 members.

But the scope of the film grew during its two years in the making and it is now drawing bursts of applause and tears from audiences because of what it has to say about human dignity and human rights for workers, notably Negroes and Puerto Ricans.

The narration is low-key and simply stated, and the music heightens emotional scenes, but does not dominate them. The cast is made up of workers speaking their own thoughts. The effect is dramatic.

Ossie Davis, the actor, saw the film and wrote to the union to say: "I think it is one of the most important things I have seen on the screen in a long time; not only for Negro people, or labor people, but for everybody."

Scene from the film made by hospital workers' union.

Members and Nonmembers Moved by Presentation

The Center for Labor and Management at the University of Iowa showed the film to its labor education staff and then told the union it had not seen a film which has been able to integrate the minority problems, civil rights, and social problems with the goals of trade unionism as well as this film has."

The police and some hospital management are not depicted in their most favorable light in scenes showing picketing. But the simple descriptions by hospital workers who tell of $30-a-week salaries only a few years ago, and their desire for a better life, are the main themes.

"It's hard just living," Ida Mae Cameron says at the opening of the film. "You have to fight for hot water and steam in the winter. You have to push to get on the bus, push when you go shopping. But when you're together you're stronger and everything comes a little easier."

An exciting new film about the fight to end poverty and win human dignity

An exciting real-life motion picture describing the efforts of hospital workers to win decent wages and human dignity through their union, Local 1199, Drug and Hospital Employees. A unique contribution to our knowledge of how low-paid minority group workers can participate actively in the fight against poverty and achieve meaningful progress. An inspiring and informative social documentary film for educational, community, religious and labor groups.

Here's what they say about LIKE A BEAUTIFUL CHILD

NEW YORK POST, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1967

Two Worlds

JAMES A. WECHSLER

It was a long and curiously disturbing day. It began with attendance at a private showing of a remarkable 26-minute film called "Like a Beautiful Child," a muted, poignant dramatization of the success story of Local 1199 of the Drug and Hospital Employes Union; The chronicle of Local 1199 is a saga too rare in modern labor annals. It is the story of how some of the most oppressed human beings in our city achieved a measure of dignity and self-respect by joining together under leaders faithful to the best traditions of the labor movement. Nearly 70 per cent of the union's present membership of 30,000 is Negro and Puerto Rican. What began as primarily a union of white-collar pharmacists was long ago transformed into a broad, effective alliance.

It worked. No doubt there have been moments of tension and uneasiness. Yet the film leaves a sense of unselfconscious warmth among the diverse groups that "This film can make an important contribution to a better society and a better America."

General James M. Gavin

"A quietly moving and lucidly truthful portrait of a trade union moving beyond ethnic differences and uniting diverse peoples in a common endeavor."

Arthur Schlesinger, Jr.

"This film demonstrates what people of all races and nationalities can accomplish by working together for a common goal."

Harry Van Arsdale, president
New York City Central Labor Council, AFL-CIO

"It is as pertinent as the latest news bulletin because it describes in the most human and moving terms how some of the least powerful in America have succeeded in winning economic power and a better life by working and fighting together. LIKE A BEAUTIFUL CHILD is a film of beauty."

Nathan Wright, Jr., executive director
Department of Urban Work, Episcopal Diocese of Newark; author, Black Power and Urban Unrest

"LIKE A BEAUTIFUL CHILD is a compelling and absorbing film which should be seen by all Americans interested in active participation in the fight to eliminate poverty and improve conditions in our cities. Once again, Local 1199 has demonstrated its capacity to blaze a trail for all of labor to emulate."

John V. Lindsay, Mayor

Summary:

This film is not basically the story of the ACWA, but rather the story of the fight for economic and social justice in America and the role that immigrants played in that long, hard battle. With a sweeping look at the 20th century, beginning in 1901, the film traces the long struggle to build unions, the mass demonstrations, picketing, sit-ins. The film ends with scenes from the March on Washington, a new chapter in man's recurrent struggle for liberty and justice.

Introduction: (Suggested remarks before showing film)

In the first decade of the 20th century more than 8½ million people came to America in search of a new life. They came with their families and their dreams of a better life, and the illusion that America was the promised land with abundance for all. Before long, they found that Golden America was half dream and half nightmare. While the rich lived in luxury, immigrant families were crowded into ghettos sometimes as many as 17 in 4 rooms with the children and mothers working all day in the home while the father earned starvation wages as a factory hand. Sometimes the children went to work in the mills or the mines for long hours working under deplorable conditions.

How these workers fought to free themselves from the ghetto, the sweatshop and the misery and degradation of fear, hunger and poverty is the story told in the film we are going to see. This is the story of how a great union was born out of suffering and oppression, strikes, blacklists, violence and sometimes death. But this is not just the story of one union, it is the history of all workers during this period and their long fight for economic justice, dignity and security.

After we see "The Inheritance" we are going to discuss how this never-ending fight for freedom is going on today.

Discussion Questions:

1. Millions of immigrants came to America and despite the fact that many spoke different languages and had vastly different backgrounds, they were welded together by their common misery and exploitation. What contribution do you think these people made to the American labor movement?

   - Organized the first unions before there was a union movement to support strikes and create strike funds.

   - They defied the blacklist, the labor spies, jail and beatings to win the right to organize, the right to collective bargaining.

   - When workers know the history of the heroic workers who built this union, they cannot be misled by the anti-Semetic propaganda which employers often use today in organizing campaigns.

   - NOTE: The following facts are provided if you want to develop a larger discussion around immigration.

     - At the turn of the century the nation was expanding and the need for additional workers was desperate. Immigration was encouraged. Nearly 9 million people came to America from Europe between 1901 and 1910.

     - Immigrants admitted during this period included: 530,105 Scandanavians, 873,660 Poles, 698,061 Germans, 1,661,948 Italians, 332,446 Slovaks, 371,779 Irish, 976,263 Jews, 387,005 English, 309,727 Croation and Slovenians, 210,794 Greeks, and 132,706 Japanese.

2. In trying to organize unions during the early part of this century people risked everything, even their lives. What made them fight so desperately to establish unions at all costs?

   - They had reached a point of desperation where they had very little to lose in the fight to improve their lives.

3. How could they win when they lacked any resources and had such powerful opponents in industry and government -- opponents who could blacklist workers, get injunctions and call out the police to break up picket lines?

   - The workers united, they supported each other in using the only weapon they had -- the strike. They used it again and again.

   - The workers were not without friends outside the labor movement. The strikes dramatized their miserable conditions and appealed to the conscience of America. People like Jane Addams -- as we see in the film -- went to the employers and appealed to them to look at the conditions their employees worked under.

4. The theme of this movie is that the fight for freedom is a never ending struggle.

   The song in the films says:

   "Freedom is a hard-won thing,
   You've got to work for it,
   Fight for it,
   Day and night for it,
   And every generation's got to win it again."

   What does the last line in the song mean to you -- "And every generation's got to win it again."?

   Can you give any examples of the fight for freedom that is being waged today?

   - Organizing in the South and other unorganized areas
   - The fight against the attacks on the union shop and social legislation led by Goldwater Republicans and the radical right wing groups
   - The fight for equal right for all
   - The fight against poverty

5. ACWA has become a model union in its relationship with industry. It is often cited as a union with few strikes in its long period of harmonious industrial relations. With the violent conflicts which we have seen here in its early history, how do you account for this?

   - Out of this kind of struggle came a relationship between equals -- management had to respect a strong union which spoke for its members and a relationship of mutual responsibility and respect evolved.

APRIL: THE ROOT, THE SEED, THE EGG
Hal Borland

"It's pine pollen," I told him. The pollen from those pines was dusting the grass and sifting into every house for several hundred yards around. I couldn't say how much pollen those pines were spilling into every breeze, but I know it was beyond human comprehension.

We have, close beside our own house, one towering old Norway spruce, and every spring its male catkins fill the air with pollen. The air shimmers in the sunlight for days. And on the front porch, where the breezes eddy, that pollen settles in drifts and ripples. I sweep it up, at the peak of pollen time, to keep from tracking it into the house, and I often get half a pint of it. How much pollen is there in half a pint, how many grains? That spruce pollen, like the pollen from the white pines, is finer than dust. I can barely make out the shape of the individual grains under a ten-power glass. When I try to guess I have to say there are more pollen grains on my front porch than there were snowflakes on my front lawn all last winter. And every one of those grains of pollen is a fleck of life.

Life. We are dealing with life, in frog eggs, in gnats, in pollen grains. And we are dealing with infinity, as far as we can judge; certainly with numbers beyond our human comprehension. We are dealing with spring, and life renewing itself. How can anyone be unaware? The seed, the egg, the root—awakening and each one with its own degree of sentience, its own response. The earth's axis moves a trace, the sun's rays are a hair less slanted, the air warms by a few degrees, and things happen. We see a migrant robin, watch a maple tree burst bud, follow a hungry bee from one crocus to another. Spring comes, we say. Winter is over and gone, and now life will be easier for another season, with no snow to clog the streets, no ice to choke the harbors. We have won through another winter. We have survived.

And all around us is proof that life survives, teeming life of which we are only a minor manifestation. And the miracles are in the root, the seed, the egg, not in the laboratories or the machines. The enduring truth of the earth, and perhaps of the universe, is implicit in April—in springtime.

LABOR and the CIA

by SIDNEY LENS

When George Meany, the "honest plumber" who presides over the AFL-CIO, recently told reporters that his organization, unlike certain student, educational, and religious groups, had never received financial favors from the Central Intelligence Agency, his comment was received with skepticism. "I suppose it's just my natural ingrained opposition to spy activities," Meany said. "I think the CIA has a job to do, but it can do it without using or subsidizing the labor movement."

The disclaimer was followed by others from Jay Lovestone, director of the AFL-CIO international affairs department, who was once termed by Edwin Lahey of the Knight Newspapers "a real mystery man," and Irving Brown, Lovestone's closest associate and representative to the United Nations from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Meany's denial of CIA support was received with cynicism by those on the inside in Washington and elsewhere who had been persuaded by considerable evidence over a period of many years that Lovestone worked closely with the CIA. A Government official who has been in the center of international labor affairs for two decades claims that "it's hard to tell who uses who, Lovestone the CIA or vice versa, but there's no doubt of the relationship."

Even labor columnist Victor Riesel, who expresses the warmest feelings for Lovestone and Meany, commented: "Certainly the Central Intelligence Agency and the American labor movement have cooperated. . . . Inside American labor, cooperation with the CIA privately is considered a badge of honor." According to Riesel, labor and the CIA collaborate on "a vast international front—and with labor leaders headquartered in Washington, New York, Chicago, Detroit, San Francisco, and even Denver."

Victor Reuther, who directs the United Automobile Workers international affairs department for his brother, UAW President Walter Reuther, caused a mild sensation in May, 1966, when Harry Bernstein of The Los Angeles Times quoted him as saying that the AFL-CIO is heavily "involved" with the CIA. He has since repeated and widened the charge: "All I can say now," he told James A. Wechsler of The New York Post recently, "is that there is a lot bigger story in the CIA's financial and other connections with the AFL-CIO. I did my best to try to lift the lid on it. And some day it will all come out."

There is a plaintive tone to these words. The exposure of student-CIA links came when a disenchanted National Student Association (NSA) leader told his story to friends in Washington, who eventually passed it on to Ramparts magazine. This tale was relatively easy to trace, because money was passed to the NSA through suspect foundations, some of which were little more than mail drops, and be-

Organizing Watts

Labor-Aided Enterprise Applies Union Expertise To Ghetto's Problems

'Community Union' Sponsors Job Training, Credit Union, Builds Vest Pocket Parks

Mending Labor's Poor Image

7-7-69

By MITCHELL GORDON
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

LOS ANGELES—"They're all right," says a black youth at a bus stop along Watts' Central Avenue. "They took us to camp for a couple of weeks during the summer, and no one else did that."

But A. Z. Smith, who runs a barbershop in the heart of Watts, wonders if the whole effort is "just window dressing."

The skepticism may be pardonable, for the effort in question is a venture by Big Labor into the problems of the ghetto. And the ghetto dweller tends to see unions as exclusive bodies that protect the status quo rather than as benefactors.

Reversing that image while attacking the problems of the ghetto—and possibly lining up new sources of membership in the future—is the goal of a Watts "community union" organized by the United Auto Workers and nine other trade unions. The unions believe their skills can be as effective in mobilizing low-income minorities as they have been in bargaining with industry.

Labor's experiment in the Watts ghetto, backed by Federal and foundation money, is called the Watts Labor Community Action Committee. Projects include running a "minibus" service between the ghetto and outlying factories, operating a sizable farm in the middle of town, a live-in job training program for the poor at an old county home for alcoholics and a beginning effort to train a staff for a 470-bed public hospital currently under construction in Watts.

Doing What We Can

The idea of marrying labor's skills with the needs of the black and Mexican-American minorities originally came from two university research economists at the University of California at Los Angeles. The labor leaders are taking particular care to be politic about offering help; local residents run the union, with advice from labor officials. "We've no intention of going in there and telling people what to do, but we do mean to provide what assistance we can, including the loan of potential leaders from the ranks of our own members who live in the area," says Paul Schrade, chief of the UAW's Western Region No. 6.

The Watts Labor Committee, plagued after its opening in July 1965 by poor leadership and community indifference, is gaining momentum now, and two other community unions have been started, in East Los Angeles and Newark, N.J. The going hasn't been easy. "Newark is something of a disappointment in terms of how fast it's getting started," says Jack T. Conway, a foundation official who is advising the labor unions involved. "But we had those troubles in Watts, too."

The unions, at least, are pleased enough to be planning an expansion of the program. "We expect to organize other community unions in a number of other major urban centers in the near future," says Walter Reuther, president of the UAW. Five or six more are planned by the end of 1969, with Oakland, Detroit and San Francisco among the possible locations.

Joint Venture

Allied with the UAW in the effort are the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, the Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen of North America, the Building Service Employes International Union, the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, the Laundry, Dry Cleaning and Dye Workers International Union, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, the International Association of Machinists, the International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers and the United Rubber Workers of America. An eleventh union, the United Steelworkers of America, recently agreed to help on special projects.

Ted Watkins, the UAW aide who is acting as Watts Labor Committee's chairman, acknowledges that Watts residents are exposed to some "union orientation" from time to time, but he denies that the program is a "public relations gimmick."

Charles Knox, local aide to Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins, a black Democrat whose Congressional district includes Watts, thinks the labor combine should throw its weight behind existing organizations, rather than devising its own projects. "We can't afford a lot of disjointed approaches to ghetto problems," he says. "There just aren't that much resources around."

Mr. Knox also criticizes the Watts Labor Committee for concentrating on "visible programs in order to help labor improve its image in the community, when it's the invisible ones, like developing skills that can lead to something, that count."

Change Is Possible

Mr. Watkins doesn't deny that some of the projects have been chosen for their visibility. In fact, the first phase of the Labor Committee's work concentrated on improving the physical environment of Watts, where about a third of Los Angeles' 450,000 blacks live. Some 22 parcels of private and public land—some as small as 40-by-100 feet—were turned into vest pocket parks, one with a sheltered barbecue and shuffleboard facility for older persons, another with a terraced pit for presenting neighborhood plays. The summer camp program is another "visible" project.

"It's important," says Mr. Watkins, "to show people who have reason to be skeptical of new organizations and community improvement programs that you can in fact make some meaningful changes in their environment. And it's important to do that quickly, so you can buy the time and win the support necessary for the more difficult undertakings."

There was much volunteer help in constructing the parks. They are maintained under two Federal programs. One, the Neighberhood Youth Corps, pays $1.40 an hour to 75 youths aged 17 to 21 who aren't in school anymore longer. The other, called the Concentrated Employment Project, pays $2 an hour to 60 adult workers.

The Labor Committee now has some profit-seeking enterprises in the ghetto: Two gas stations, which reportedly return about $50,000 a year in profits while giving youths job experience and training; a ceramics plant and showroom; a poultry raising operation; and a farming operation on land leased from the city Department of Water and Power under high-tension lines. In the latter endeavor, up to 200 youths get $1.40 to $2 an hour while growing vegetables, flowers and trees; a more extensive project is planned to train horticulturists.

A number of other Labor Committee projects are designed to provide vital services. With a $70,000 grant from the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development, the union has purchased 10 12-passenger buses for transportation (50 cents a ride) between south Los Angeles and five big factories in outlying sections of the city. There also is a credit union providing loans at low interest.

The Labor Committee's most ambitious project is at Saugus, 30 miles northeast of Los Angeles. There a 588-acre property formerly used as a county facility for treating alcoholics has been leased for use as an educational center. Soon, says Mr. Watkins, it will be providing live-in facilities for about 500 men and women with a full-time staff of 75 and a year-long training program.

The program aims to develop good work habits and then teach specific skills, including secretarial work and food preparation, carpentry, plumbing, electrical work and heavy equipment operation.

Much interest focuses on the Martin Luther King Hospital, now under construction in Watts. When it opens in 1970, it will offer 1,400 nonprofessional jobs, and Mr. Watkins says he hopes to fill half of them with locally trained people. The Labor Committee is planning detailed courses in such subjects as X-ray technology and practical nursing.

The UAW's Mr. Watkins is eager to get going in areas relatively untouched thus far by the Labor Committee—housing, welfare and health. He is negotiating with the California State Highway Department for up to 2,600 houses slated for removal to make way for the projected Century Freeway. If purchased, the houses would be offered at a low price to owners of vacant ghetto lots or dilapidated homes.

The Labor Committee's 1969 budget of $2 million comes mostly from the Department of Labor, other Federal agencies and foundations. The unions are paying about $200,000 this year, plus the salaries of key union presonnel assigned to the community project. A $350,000 grant just received from the Rockefeller Foundation is earmarked for the Saugus training center.

The community union in Newark, in operation since the beginning of 1968, has received about $200,000 in grants. It has concentrated thus far on helping black contractors bid more effectively on construction jobs, providing basic education for adults and developing an employment program with a business group.

The East Los Angeles community union has been functioning since May 1968, with stress on Mexican-American entrepreneurship. It operates a mattress-making factory and now is getting into job training with a $250,000 contract from the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. It also is working to help women get off welfare and into productive jobs.

SAN FRANCISCO—Pacific Coast Stock Exchange trading for the first six months of 1969 totaled 91.9 million shares, up 33% from 69.2 million shares in the 1968 period, the exchange said. The dollar value of the shares rose 24.2% to $3.05 billion.

UNION WAR CHESTS grow as preparations mount for tough bargaining next year.

The Rubber Workers Union expects to have a $10 million strike fund when its major contracts expire next April, up from $6.5 million three years earlier. The United Auto Workers, whose auto-industry pacts run out in September 1970, currently has a $95.6 million kitty and hopes to have $123 million at the deadline. A special UAW convention next month is likely to boost strike benefits for workers with families to $40 weekly from $30.

The Machinists Union, embroiled in disputes with three major airlines and the nation's railroads, launches a campaign to rebuild its strike fund, currently below $1 million; in January, rank-and-filers will vote whether to double monthly contributions to $1 and increase weekly benefits by $15 to $40. The Steelworkers Union, which won't negotiate another basic steel pact until 1971, already has $31.5 million to support strikers.

The International Union of Electrical Workers, which struck GE yesterday, won't discuss the size of its strike fund. But it probably holds less than $3 million.

EXECUTIVE HIRING slows a bit as the economy begins to cool.

Many placement experts detect a recent softening in demand for executives. Third quarter placements by Maichle & Wytmar, Chicago executive recruiters, declined 12% from the previous quarter. "There's a definite slowdown" in executive hiring among West Coast defense and electronics companies, says an official of John G. Edmundson & Associates, Los Angeles consultants. Boston's Double-M executive placement service finds companies stiffening requirements, taking more time to make a hiring decision.

Still, demand remains generally strong, especially for marketing, financial and cost-conscious manufacturing executives. Many companies such as United Aircraft, Kraftco and Raytheon report no significant change in their executive hiring pace. Gillette's need for executives expands "simply because of growth." Judy Wald Personnel, a New York agency that places advertising executives, doubled its volume in the past year.

AFL-CIO ORGANIZERS quietly map plans to broaden their activity.

The nine-member AFL-CIO organizing committee, headed by Seafarers boss Paul Hall, will soon be expanded and special subcommittees established. The new panels will focus on organizing methods and techniques, public-employe unionism and "cooperative" organizing. Cooperative campaigns, jointly undertaken by several unions, will get special emphasis. St. Louis, Wichita, Seattle are current targets for new cooperative campaigns.

AFL-CIO organizing director William Kircher finds "greater interest" among affiliates in organizing than ever before. One sign: During the recent AFL-CIO convention, over 200 labor officials, including 47 union presidents, attended an early Sunday morning meeting on organizing. Yet organizers worry that anticipated Republican reshaping of the NLRB and increasing use of "labor relations consultants" by employers to fight off unions will make their job more difficult.

The federation's plans appear to be at least partially in response to the rival Alliance for Labor Action.

LETTER CARRIERS plan a massive newspaper ad campaign to persuade Nixon to sign a bill raising postal workers' pay 5.4%. The Letter Carriers Union started preparing to purchase space in 300 newspapers after the President threatened to veto the bill because of its inflationary impact.

RETAIL TIRE DEALERS say they currently need at least 21,000 new employes and may require another 21,000 in the year ahead. About 25% of the demand is for white-collar workers in management and sales, according to the National Tire Dealers and Retreaders Association. The trade group launches a $100,000 recruitment program.

LADY COPS in Pittsburgh who serve as school-crossing guards are promised some unusual fringe benefits. NEGRO CONTRACTORS would get help from a new Urban Coalition project.

The poverty-fighting Coalition hopes to set up early next year an institute designed to strengthen minority construction contractors. It would provide technical assistance and working capital through low-interest loans. The institute would also help train minority group workers in construction skills. A major aim: To make minority contractors more competitive in bidding for Federal construction work under "model cities" renewal programs.

The Coalition seeks funds from foundations. It figures it needs about $1.5 million to get the institute, to be headquartered in Washington, operating in five cities the first year. Then more would be added in the next two years. Cities under consideration include Los Angeles, Philadelphia, Chicago, Pittsburgh and San Antonio.

Planners work closely with labor leaders, businessmen and the National Association of Minority Contractors.

CORPORATE RECRUITERS, many with reduced quotas to fill, score well on campus.

With more graduates than jobs available in some areas, companies report little difficulty in meeting hiring goals. Caterpillar Tractor easily landed 106 June grads, 19 fewer than a year ago. Sundstrand Corp. in Rockford, Ill., sought and found six engineering students after hiring 41 from the class of '68. Ford's college recruiting has gone faster than last year.

Students swarmed recruiters. The number of job interviews at the University of Illinois jumped 53% from the previous school year, while Indiana University's business school interview schedule was 20% heavier. Yet a University of Michigan official detected no "panicking" among job-hunting students. Many college placement specialists attribute the increased interest in corporate jobs to the fact that grad-school enrolment no longer guarantees draft deferment.

A College Placement Council survey shows starting salaries for grads with technical degrees average $819 monthly, up 6.8% from last year. Non-technical pay rose 8.2% to $711.

POSTAL UNIONS press a subtle attack on laws that bar them from striking.

As members grow restive, the National Association of Letter Carriers, supported by other postal unions, sues to overturn a mandatory oath that prohibits Federal employes from even advocating the right to strike. A Federal labor expert concedes the oath is "vulnerable" because of its vague wording. Letter Carriers President James Rademacher hints the suit is just "the first step" in an eventual challenge to several Federal statutes banning walkouts.

Irked by a recent 4.1% pay rise, less than half that given other Federal employes, postal workers bombard union leaders with demands for bolder action. "If you don't want to strike," one letter carrier writes Rademacher, "we'd better get somebody who does." Alarmed by the decision of 72 New York postal workers to call in sick one recent morning, union officials issue strong warnings to rank-and-filers against striking.

Postal unions tell Congress passage of a 5.4% "emergency" pay boost for their members would ease tensions.

BIG INSURANCE FIRMS hire more Negro salesmen, hurting black companies.

Prudential Insurance has 600 Negroes on its 19,000-member sales force, up from 400 at the end of 1966. Metropolitan Life's recruiting efforts at Negro colleges are beginning to "really pay off," says a vice president. In the hopes of attracting blacks, Life & Casualty Insurance Co. of Tennessee lends eight executives to predominantly Negro Fisk University to teach management courses part-time.

"Our best talent is siphoned off" by major insurance companies, observes the president of New York's black-owned United Mutual Life Insurance. North Carolina Mutual Life Insurance, a large Durham-based company, says the current stress on "black pride and black identity" is helping it hold agents. The National Insurance Association, a Negro trade group, bars white recruiters from its conventions to prevent raiding.

Desire to reach the rapidly expanding Negro market for insurance is a major factor behind the drive to hire black salesmen.

FEAR OF INFILTRATION by radical college students causes some employers to balk at hiring youths for the summer, Youthpower Inc. says. More firms ask for "clean-cut, neatly dressed young people," it says.

CANADIAN STEELWORKERS and dockworkers seek big gains at the bargaining table.

The United Steelworkers Union, which struck International Nickel Co. of Canada last week, is locked in tough negotiations with steel makers in Ontario. A key issue: The Steelworkers' demand for a cost-of-living escalator, which they are seeking for the first time since 1945. The union will be free to strike after a government conciliator, who's working with the parties, issues his report—probably around the end of the month.

In British Columbia, West Coast longshoremen press for a 50% increase in pay and benefits over three years. "Everybody expects the worst" when the current contract expires Aug. 1, says one shipper. Management officials want any new pact to allow them to require men to work Sundays. A strike would tie up the major port of Vancouver, hurting grain, lumber and pulp producers.

Canada has already lost wheat sales to Japan because a dock walkout is threatened, grain sources say.

UNION PICKETING on private property "is historically a concern of state law," Chief Justice Burger said, suggesting that the Supreme Court has gone too far in curbing the power of the states to halt such picketing. His opinion, expressed in a ruling on an obscure Alabama labor case, indicates a possible High Court shift to more state authority over picketing. In a second case, he urged reconsideration of an important 1959 decision circumscribing states' authority to curb picketing.

Drop charges against students, Gainesville investigators urge

GAINESVILLE, Fla.

An eight-person independent citizens' committee came here May 26 for a day of investigation into the racial crisis that has rocked the University of Florida campus in recent months. After hearing testimony from 27 witnesses, the committee urged the university administration to secure dismissal of charges against eight students arrested during a peaceful demonstration April 15 "as a first step" toward achieving "mutual understanding and respect" on campus.

The committee, chaired by Southern Regional Council Executive Director Paul Anthony, arrived at the invitation of AFT Local 1880 and the Student Government Association. The AFT here has taken a leadership role in trying to resolve the racial conflicts which have simmered since 1969, when black students first presented a list of six demands to help recruit more minority-group students and faculty. (Of 2,500 faculty members, only nine are black, and of last year's entering freshman body of 2,800, only 110 were black.)

On April 15, a demonstration of several hundred students and faculty was held in support of the demands. Police broke up the peaceful rally with gas and clubs in what Local 1880 President Norman Markel termed a "police riot."

Following the arrests, the AFT urged that outside mediators be brought in to help resolve the deepening crisis. University President Stephen O'Connell refused the request, and when the citizens' committee sought to use the student union for its hearings May 26, he banned it from campus. The committee met and took testimony in the off-campus Catholic Students Center.

Among the witnesses at the hearing was Sam Taylor, vice-president of the student body. Taylor testified that the first blacks were not admitted to the university until 1962 and that the university housing office continues to maintain separate lists of housing units where blacks are "acceptable." Taylor also read the students' six demands which seek greater minority-group power in college affairs.

One of these demands was met, temporarily, in 1969, Taylor said, when the university hired a coordinator of minority affairs, just before a scheduled HEW audit into its employment practices. But the coordinator left after 15 months.

The ex-coordinator, Roy Mitchell, also testified and said that during his employment he was neither introduced to nor consulted by President O'Connell. He said he was harassed by the administration and eventually quit. Mitchell also testified that although the university has started a Dept. of African Studies, and has hired Ronald Foreman as its head, it has given him neither budget nor staff.

Len Lewis, AFT director of civil rights, who has been assisting the local during the crisis, attended the hearings as an official union observer.

The committee said it would prepare a detailed report, but in a brief press statement said "the crisis appeared to be even more ominous than we had previously believed it to be."

"The university," it continued, "must find the way to mutual understanding and respect of its members. . . . We believe that the university must become a place where the cultural pluralism of society finds its fullest and freest expression. It must become a university which all students—white, black, brown, or red—feel is theirs, one in which they have a stake."

A "first beginning" toward this goal, the committee said, would be "intervention on the part of the university administration to secure the dismissal of charges against the students arrested April 15." The committee said the students, "in an entirely nonviolent and nondisruptive way, were seeking answers to proposals that had been passed through the university's proper channels 18 months before."

Members of the committee, besides Anthony, were Dr. Robert Brisbane, professor of political science, Morehouse College; David Crossland, southern representative, National Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights; Jean Fairfax, director of legal information and community services for the NAACP legal defense and educational fund; Dr. Paul Gaston, professor of history at the University of Virginia; Al Kehrer, regional director, AFL-CIO civil-rights department; Rev. Powers McCleod, First United Methodist Church, Pensacola, Fla.; and Harry Walker, president, student body, Univ. of South Carolina.

Paul Anthony and Al Kehrer, two members of the AFT-initiated investigating team, conduct hearings at the University of Florida, Gainesville, May 26. One of the 27 witnesses was Clarence Martin (above), former chairman of the Black Students Union.

LEGISLATIVE ROUNDUP:

Union lobby kills Taylor amendment

WASHINGTON, D.C.

"Intense" union pressure, as one member of the state assembly characterized it, forced the Republican leadership in the New York State legislature to kill a bill May 10 that would have restricted public-employee bargaining under the Taylor Act to salaries, vacations, and working-hours only. United Federation of Teachers President Albert Shanker characterized the proposed bill at a press conference as one which would "destroy the negotiating process."

A flood of phone calls to legislators over the Mother's Day weekend, mobilized by unions of policemen, firemen, teachers, and sanitation workers, among others, caused the legislators to drop the bill in its current form for this legislative session.

Across the country, in Olympia, Wash., teacher-union and state labor federation pressure the same weekend stopped the association's "professional-practices" bill and a limitation on what is negotiable under the present state bargaining law from being tacked onto a community-college negotiations act. "We called Lou Stewart, who's education director of the Washington State Labor Council, just before noon on Mother's Day to ask him to get down to the legislature to help stop this for us," reported John Barton, WSFT legislative committee chairman, and Ross Rieder, state Federation president, "and he was already on his way." The WSFT and the state labor body also mobilized a successful telegram drive to get the governor to veto sections of the budget bill putting a two-year moratorium on raises for all state employees, including college teachers, and on increments for college teachers making $15,000 or more a year.

Other recent news from the state legislatures:

- In Florida, the legislature is loaded with bills against the state universities and college teachers, reports Florida Federation of Teachers legislative chairman Benjamin Franklin. He cited such items as bills barring "rabble-rousing" speakers from college campuses, mandating dismissal of faculty and college employees who engage in "disruptive" activities, and so on.
- On May 25, the Delaware Federation of Teachers had its own collective-bargaining bill introduced in the House, reported John Shuey, DFT president. It would permit strikes after mediation, with no penalties. Rep. Thomas Little of Fairfax, a former NEA teacher, has introduced what is basically the Conservative Union's plan to set up a statewide voucher system which Shuey said "would completely annihilate the public schools." It is not expected to go far, but its introduction is an item of note.
- Last-minute flurrying in the Oregon legislature, reported Shirley Gold, executive secretary of the Portland Federation of Teachers, brought closer to passage a good revision of the tenure act, making it statewide, and a new amendment to the consultation act broadening the scope of bargaining to include written memoranda of agreement, good-faith bargaining, mediation, fact-finding, and so on.
- Although the legislature in New Jersey adjourned until after November, a couple of legislators will be holding hearings June 15 on the measure to kill the Public Employee Relations Commission. The Federation expects to testify in favor of retaining the commission. Ray Peterson of the NJFT said labor's hopes and efforts are being directed toward the November election, when all of the seats in the assembly are open. Running in the Essex County (Newark) Democratic primary June 8 is Joel Jacobson, UAW lobbyist, who was nearly arrested while on teacher picket lines.
- In Iowa, the AFT's anti-injunction bill never got out of committee, reported Johann Eschbach, state Federation president. "They've been fighting on the tax bill since the session opened in January," he reported, "and nothing has been done yet." This was the general story in most of the states reported in the American Teacher's survey last month, and rechecked the last week of May.

In New York and Washington, teacher unions had other successes. In New York, bills to kill the New York City board of examiners and to institute continuous year-long schools were stopped through Federation action. Still pending there are a performance-contracting bill, now amended to limit such contracts to no more than 10 districts each year for the next three years (under the original bill, all 750 state districts could have instituted it immediately if they'd wanted to), and that no performance-contracting-hired person could bump a certified teacher from a job. Even with these changes, though, the Federation still opposes the bill, reported John Fallon of the NYSFT. On May 23, a teacher-licensing bill was introduced which would set up a "professional-practices" commission which would exclude New York City teachers, and thus keep any commission seats in the hands of the state education association. The Federation hopes to defeat this measure, too.

In Washington, the union's proposal that 50 percent of the community-college budget be spent on instructional purposes (Seattle community college now spends only 38 percent, for example, with the rest going to administration, etc.) was taken up on the floor and the Council on Higher Education was directed by the legislature to consider it in its report, due sometime next year. The legislature also extended unemployment compensation to teachers, if so negotiated, and workmen's compensation is now universal. "Labor action got these for us," said Ross Rieder.

DEFINING LABOR EDUCATION NEEDS

DEFINING LABOR

In attempting to define Labor Education needs there is a great temptation to simply read off a laundry list of every conceivable educational need known to man and then suggest that the interested parties sort out those most appropriate to their mission and go on from there. I'll try not to do that but if by the time I'm finished it seems as if I have done so, perhaps I will also have catalogued them into some useful framework which will enable all of us to decide what our roles might be in attempting to meet such needs.

Weaknesses of Public Education

At the outset let me suggest to you that the public educational system has failed the ordinary worker shamefully in preparing him for the work that he performs, the security of his family and his life as a responsible citizen.

If it is true, and it is, that many of our high schools are graduating students who are almost functional illiterates, then the students are not alone in their failures.

If it is true, and it is, that employers find many vocational school graduates have learned obsolete skills, are unable to be trained for the present low-level hiring jobs and even less trainable for the highly advanced positions of the future, then not only are many workers misguided.

If it is true, and it is, that the average employee can expect to change jobs six times during his work life and yet finds his present education doesn't equip him for more than a life on the assembly line, then more than the worker is redundant.

If it is true, and it is, that the major problems experienced by newly hired black workers are those caused by their fellow employees, then more than the workers' attitudes have been misformed.

I'm sure that this suggests to you that I am not particularly sanguine about our public education system. In fact, I find myself quite sympathetic to the position of the ghetto parents who are demanding community control of their schools. These parents recognize that a good education has traditionally been the pathway up the social-mobility ladder and out of poverty. And they are justifiably frantic to find that their children can't escape via the ghetto schools. Also, understandably, they are quite cynical about being told to leave control in the hands of the "professionals". Their angry reply is that the professionals have been in control for these many years and their schools have gone from bad to worse; certainly community control can't destroy what is already a disaster area.

Shortcomings of Adult Education

Having "socked it to" the primary-secondary school system let me now turn to the field of adult education. The record there is not too much better if it's improved at all.

It is only in the recent past that adult educators have recognized the need of ordinary working adults for special programs that remedy the great failures of their public school experiences. I suppose nothing is more fashionable in adult education programs nowadays than to have a basic literacy component funded by a federal grant. Also a course of preparations for taking the High School Equivalency test is now regarded as a requisite for a well-rounded catalogue. But the vast bulk of workers who could benefit from such programs are never reached, never enroll and never complete the appropriate courses of study.

Now I know that a large number of people are enrolled in such programs but it is still true that they are a relative handful compared to the backlog of decades of neglect. And this neglect hits directly at the worker's pay check as he finds it difficult to be hired without credentials if he's laid-off from a marginal job, or if he's denied a promotion for which the employer now requires a High School Diploma.

EDUCATION NEEDS

It is an easy answer to say, "Well, we've tried to reach them, but we're not going to lead them by the hand." That may be an easy answer but it's not a good one. The fact still remains that adult education hasn't remedied the initial failures of the public school system. Certainly a primary task of adult education is remedial education.

I mentioned before that the graduates of vocational schools are often trained for obsolete skills and unable to be trained for the available jobs. This is by no means a unique phenomenon. The same can be said of university and college graduates. Part of the campus discontent is engendered by what the students feel is the irrelevancy of their education to the world that awaits them upon graduation. But they, at least, have a credential, a diploma, which qualifies them for alternate opportunities to those they may have initially selected. The vocational school graduate who is skilled in "cabinet making" feels defrauded if "cabinet maker" jobs are scarce and he has to settle for a job in a laundry or as a stock clerk. He feels doubly discontented if the job for which he prepared, and was hired, evaporates with new technology and he is forced to undergo retraining. He asks why he was not trained for a secure job initially. Why was he, in a sense, exploited and then cast aside to be retrained at his own expense in terms of reduced income during the retraining period?

Now you may argue that this is the exception rather than the rule, but a survey was conducted two years ago soliciting the suggestions of employers on how to make vocational, technical and high school education more relevant to industries' needs. And the replies from over 150 employers added line, chapter and verse to the criticism I have just outlined.

Also you may argue that we haven't heard any recent groundswell of discontent and therefore, both workers and employers must be satisfied. But don't be too sure. While we are presently witnessing a proliferation of federal manpower programs—O. J. T., Work Study, Up-Grading, Apprenticeship, Pre-Apprenticeship, etc.,—at the same time, pick up the want-ad section of any newspaper and see the skilled jobs advertised and "gone begging". Also we are in a period of relatively full employment,—what will happen to the jobs of large numbers of presently employed unskilled, semi-skilled and even skilled employees if a recession follows our present inflation? Further, speaking facetiously, "God forbid, suppose peace should break out!"

When that happens, those laid off without a marketable skill may voice remarks about adult educational opportunities which will make mine seem exceedingly mild indeed.

Must Learn More About Living

But the worker's educational needs are not satisfied when he can read the calibrations on a micrometer or thread a needle from the cab of an eighty-foot crane. He wants and needs to know more than how to earn a livelihood. He wants and needs to learn more about living.

It is not by accident that a racist demogague like George Wallace scored heavily during the 1968 election in the working class precincts of Gary, Indiana; Baltimore, Maryland; Detroit, Michigan; Chicago, Illinois; and need I add, St. Louis, Springfield and Kansas City, Missouri.

He scored heavily because he played on the fears, the prejudices and the ignorance of white, middle class workers. (I use the term "ignorance" here in the sense of "lack of knowledge" and not in a derogatory sense.)

Has the field of adult education dealt with this phenomenon? I think not; at least not adequately. Scan your catalogues; review your course offerings and programs. It hasn't been dealt with in curricula exclusively devoted to Economics 101, Business English and "How to Make Money in the Stock Market."

INTRODUCTION:

Unemployment is back in the news with increasing frequency these days. (+) The thing that makes it "hot" news, however, is that it doesn't seem to be exclusively any one of the three or four commonly accepted types. The normal division between types of unemployment was: (1) Cyclical, (2) Seasonal, (3) Frictional, and possibly (4) Technological. But this recent type is not just Cyclical; because it has been with us since 1947 during both the periods of prosperity and economic downturn.[50] At the same time it is something more than Frictional; because---by definition---this term is usually reserved for unemployment of short duration.[50] Seasonal unemployment is just what the name represents it to be: Seasonal; but this type lasts through all of the ups and downs within the year. Finally, to quote only one of an indefinite group of authorities, this type can hardly be a reflection solely of Technology:

> (because) "Higher-than-average unemployment rates in these chronic areas are traceable to a variety of factors. Among these are (1) the shutdown of obsolete or economically unprofitable plants; (2) the transfer of important local industries to other areas; (3) changes in consumer demand, in production technology, or in the competetive market position of certain products; (4) the depletion or exhaustion of natural resources; (5) lack of adequate industrialization." ! (29)

But, argue many people, if it is not exclusively any one of these types, perhaps it is different enough to deserve a special name. So to some the best name is "Prosperity" unemployment,[50] and probably it does fit well if your primary focus is on the fact that there has been a persistently high level of unemployment even during our highest levels of prosperity. It seems to me that this might tend to obscure the fact that this different type of unemployment is largely concentrated in a few "pockets"--mostly in one area--of the country!![29]

(+) The entire bibliography would tend to demonstrate this point.

Some people--pointing out that these "pockets" of unemployment largely result in labor-market areas strongly dependent upon the prosperity of one or two dominant industries, which are no longer prosperous--prefer "Structural" unemployment. They focus on the structure of the economy in these regions which they see as radically altered.[29] The only fault here is that even this designation fails to explicitly state the fact that not only has this unemployment persisted in good times and bad, and not only is it confined to a few "pockets" of the country, but it clearly affects primarily a certain class of worker! Hence some prefer the designation "class" unemployment.

The point I am leading up to is this: which name is used is not really very important; what is really very important is what these three names-when taken together-describe. The type of unemployment which we have increasingly become aware of since 1947 can be described-by using these names-as: (1) unemployment which largely affects a certain class, (2) in certain pockets of a small area of the country, (3) in both prosperity and recession! To my way of thinking, this is a good working definition of unemployment today. Certainly, the other types have not gone away; we have a new type to compound the problem.(+) It is to this type--and only this type--that I am addressing myself. Its solution---and I hasten to add, if there is one---can be found only through a complete examination of: (1) the full meaning, definition, and awareness of everything connected with a Depressed Area; (2) a knowledge of what efforts have been attempted and/or advocated in the past to deal with this question; plus, (3) a run-through such topics as transferability of skills, exhaustion of unemployment compensation benefits, differences between young people who finish school and those who drop out, the whole philosophy of unemployment

(+) This is not to suggest that we just discovered this type. It has been around a long time; in England, for example for 60 years! We have not had the tools to measure it and separate it from other types for too long. The designation "new" is primarily to set it apart from the other standard types of which this is not one! Objections to "new" can be largely overcome by using another term. Perhaps "different" will do.

compensation, the whole question of older workers, i.e., (mobility, potential to retrain them, and the social and economic costs involved in using, or not using them, etc.), as well as a host of others too numerous to mention here!

Present Methods of Combating Depressed Area Unemployment:

Combating the problem of Depressed Areas usually takes one of two or three forms. They are: (1) moving jobs to the workers in these areas, (2) moving workers out of these areas to jobs, and of course, (3) some combination of the other two.

To accomplish the first of these requires the location of new industrial enterprises--or the relocation of old established industrial enterprises--in these areas. Encouragement for such moves usually takes one of two forms: the creation of a financial pie which may be sliced into tax forgiveness, building new factories, modernizing existing buildings, and outright grants to firms who will locate there, or; the "positive" British approach of requiring--as a matter of law[34]--that anyone building a new factory over five or ten thousand square feet, or adding on to an already existing facility, get permission from the Board of Trade.(+) Obviously the financial backing may be public or private, and may be local, regional, or national in scope.

The second approach relies upon moving the unemployed out of the area by matching them with new jobs where they are available. It is clear, for example, that some outward mobility takes place from a depressed area in any case.[41] This method creates a variety of problems which we will deal with later.

The third method involves some combination of the other two. Most European countries that do anything seem to utilize some form of this last approach.[4] England, as the best example, has been after this since 1934.[4 & 21] The Fabians had asked for work--not handouts or make-work--with retraining to provide new skills where necessary long before this. In fact assistance to unemployed workers who wished to resettle has been authorized since 1909 but even this was long after

(+) The British counterpart of our Department of Commerce, but more powerful!

the first Fabian agitation[4]! At first glance the success of this program in G. B. seems impressive. From 1936-1939 almost 125,000 workers were retrained and transfered from Depressed Areas to new jobs elsewhere.[34] More than one-half of the new factories started between 1945 and 1950 were in these areas: a total of 1,122 completed and 249 more in process.[34] The number of new jobs provided by factory employment alone in these areas was up 200,000.[34] These areas had had 38% of the national unemployment in 1932. By February 1950 this had fallen to 4%. By 1955 this was down to 1.9% of the male labor force and 2.5% of the female labor force.[34] A second glance, however, makes it quite clear that they can't claim to have licked this problem.[16] Much of their earlier success was due to the full-employment economy of World War II bolstered by the drafting of large numbers of men who might otherwise have been unemployed. Then they had a generally prosperous economy in the last few years aided by the necessity to rebuild the bombed-out sections of the country.[34] By 1958-in a time of economic downturn-the unemployment had reached four times the national level in these areas. More recently new areas have been added to the Distressed list![16]

Belgium, Germany, Sweden, and France are also committed--in some degree--to a two pronged approach.[4] Although we are not going to consider them, it should be noted that they have all had only limited success.[4]

What I have been doing thus far, then, is laying the groundwork for the notion that The Retraining of Unemployed Workers in Depressed Areas is a big subject, far too involved with other considerations to stand alone, even in a term paper! Yet what do we actually know about the subject? In three short words: not very much! I turned up four leads:(+) England,[42] which I've covered; Washington, D.C.,[42] Pennsylvania,[13] and Michigan.[42] Their contribution follows.

(+) This is not meant to imply that there are no other sources concerning this subject. My research has been extensive, not exhaustive! It is worth noting that the Pennsylvania program is "disguised" in a sense because it comes under the State Education Laws rather than Unemployment Laws. Wisconsin, for example, also has legislation which could utilize the "permissive" Federal legislation. I have been informed that they are or have done so. I haven't checked this out as yet.

SPECIFICS ON RETRAINING: (*)

Washington, D. C.:

Despite repeated references in the literature, I was unable to uncover any knowledge of any payments for the retraining of unemployed workers in the District of Columbia. This does not have to mean that Retraining never has been carried on there. It is possible, for example, that Retraining is handled entirely through the Education in Washington, D. C. ! If so, it would fall under the control of the Congress and information about it would require making contact with the "right" agency. This I have not done! I can say with at least some confidence that any Retraining that has been done managed to slip by the District Unemployment Compensation Board unnoticed. (+) I intend to follow up on this as my curiousity has been aroused.

Michigan:

In response to my inquiry the Employment Service Director of the Michigan Employment Security Commission wrote a four page reply. The legal basis of the letter read like this:

> "Section 28 (e) of the Michigan Employment Security Act, providing for vocational retraining of claimants for unemployment compensation and the payment of extended benefits for a period of 16 weeks (increased to 18 weeks in 1943) to claimants taking such retraining, has been part of the employment security act since 1939."

Earlier in the letter this enlightening sentence--which illustrates the frequency with which the act was used since 1939--appeared as follows:

> "In 1959 we inaugurated a pilot program for retraining certain workers in Michigan's Upper Peninsula."! (#)

In response to 'interest (which) had been expressed...by unemployed and others in the Iron Mountain area", preliminary surveys were made of the numbers and

(+) See Appendix A for their letter in response to my inquiry.
(#) Underlining my own emphasis, (acb).

types of unemployed and of the facilities available for training. Results of the survey indicated approximately 80 claimants interested in vocational retraining. In selecting the courses to be offered, amount of tuition, type of training most needed, costs, facilities, and length of training time were considered. After eliminating several others, two courses were finally set up. They were "Drafting and Blue Print Reading" and "Machine Shop Theory and Practice."

The maximum number of students that could have been handled was 54. All prospective trainees were given the General Aptitude Test Battery B-1002. The results were used for multi-scoring of specific batteries for draftsman and machinist. Those showing favorable scores who had at least a tenth grade education were put in the more difficult drafting course. The others were put in the machinist course. The initial enrollment was 24 in drafting and 27 in machine shop; a total of 51. Of these, 38 were on extended benefits!

Both courses ran 18 weeks, four nights a week from 6 P.M. to 10 P.M. or a total of 360 hours.(+) The machine shop group was split into three sections. Each section had an instructor. There was one supervisor to coordinate the program. The 360 hours were divided into 90 hours for blue print reading; 90 hours for shop math; 180 hours of actual shop practice. The drafting group was all together and had only one instructor. Here the 360 hours were split so that forty hours were spent on each of the following areas: mechanical, architectural, machine drawing, and sheetmetal drawing. The other 200 hours were then spent specializing in one of these areas. The major difference in the two courses was that once the drafting group had commenced no newcomers could be added. In the machine shop section, however, a student could join

(+) It was decided that any more hours per week would mean a large number of dropouts in the event any of the trainees secured full-time employment during the course. Obviously, even if the state went along with a trainee's refusing a job during the training period most unemployed would have to accept almost any reasonable offer for employment just for the economic reasons--to say nothing of the social-psychological ones!

the course at any time and not be behind. There were several drop-outs and accessions. A total of 59 attended the classes from one to 18 weeks! There were only three cases of drop-outs for personal reasons! Securing of employment caused most of the drop-outs, and in eight of these cases, workers continued to attend for several weeks while holding a full-time day job!

Financing was handled as follows: (1) Each student paid four dollars a week tuition. This covered administrative costs. (2) The State Department of Instruction paid 48% of the five salaries---($3 per hour for 4 instructors; $3.50 per hour for 1 supervisor). (3) The County Board of Supervisors put up $2000 to cover the expected deficit resulting from the decreased tuition as students dropped out. The large numbers of accessions helped to reduce this deficit and the blaance was returned to the County treasury. (4) The State paid for 492 aggregate weeks of extended benefits; a total of $17,798.50! This did not come from any specific employer's account, but rather was paid out of the Solvency Account.

The public reaction was reported to be good. The school system which had been dubious at first was also well satisfied. Local industry was both encouraging and cooperative from the start. As for the workers, themselves, they must have been pleased:

> "...out of 46 trainees who received extended benefits, 21 attended from one to 17 weeks on regular benefits. Twelve trainees attended on regular benefits only (one for the entire 18 weeks), and 8 for a time while receiving no benefits. At $4 per week tuition, when the average unemployment compensation check for the area was only $33, this definitely indicates a high degree of desire for vocational training on the part of the workers." (+)

As for results, what can you say? You can report what happened, but what is the significance of the results of retraining 59 people? Actually, (+) Taken from their letter to me. Underlining my own emphasis, (acb).

I am confronted by mixed emotions. On the one hand I find the results interesting, if not encouraging. Of the 59 trainees, 44, or 75% obtained employment. Considering the economic situation in the area, one can hardly fail to be impressed. Then, of this 44 who obtained jobs, 11 were in work utilizing their training: 7 entirely, and 4 to a lesser degree. Three other workers were employed with firms where there was a real possibility of using their training on more skilled jobs in the future. On the other hand, however, 75% of the trainees--including those who attended on regular benefits entirely--being reemployed, and only 25% of those using their training to a greater or lesser degree is hardly enough evidence to make me an advocate of retraining!

Pennsylvania:

This information was uncovered purely by accident. (+) A chance remark by a friend about a new case study on a Depressed Area just published by the B.L.S. led me to investigate, find, and order it from the Government Printing Office.[13] In rapidly scanning its contents I noticed reference to Public Law 78A which "...was particularly suited to training a work force for a new industry." I immediately fired a letter off to the obvious department, i.e., the State Employment Service, asking them to forward any and all information they might have about it. After waiting for several weeks I decided that the lead was another dud like the Washington, D.C. one, only Pennsylvania didn't have the time to waste telling me. Alas, after having just completed my paper, there in the mail--on January 5, 1961--was an envelope from the Pennsylvania State Department of Public Instruction! Undaunted, I began to examine the contents. The Pennsylvania story could properly be called the whole story on retraining that has been unearthed up to this moment. It warrants careful study.

(+) It seems entirely possible that there may be a great deal of retraining going on in the U.S.! We may well have an adequate body of literature on the subject just begging to be pulled together. Much of it might be--in a sense--"disguised" as Pennsylvania's is by being under some department other than Employment. Of course there may be no other information on the subject available. In any event it may be worth looking at with more care.

Legislative Background:

Nothing I could say--no paraphrase I attempted--could state this better than the letter itself; therefore, let it speak:

"Discharge of the local school district's responsibility for the training of the unemployed has been made possible by the enactment of both Federal and State legislature.

Federal Law - Section 7, (5) of the George-Barden Law provides that Federal funds appropriated under the authority of the Act may be used for the operation of

> 'pre-employment schools and classes organized for persons over 18 years of age or persons who have left the full time school,' and that these schools and classes

> 'may be operated for less than 9 months per year and without the requirement that a minimum of 50 percent of the time must be given to shop work on a useful or productive basis.'

This is the legal basis for conducting Type C courses and for using George-Barden funds for their support. National policy relating to the operation of these classes is contained in Vocational Education Bulletine No. 1, Administration of Vocational Education, revised 1948, pages 70 and 71, Types of All-day Trade Training - Type C.

Pennsylvania Law - Pennsylvania accepted the Type C program in 1951 with the passage of Act 134A. At the close of the biennium the program was reinstated with the passage of Act 78A. Then in 1957 the programs were permanently instituted in section 2508.3 of the School Law. Section 2508.3 is titled 'Payments for Vocational Training of Recipients of Public Assistance and Unemployment Compensation.' The act states:

> 'the State Board for Vocational Education shall establish rules and regulations and thereunder approve and authorize payment of the full cost of intensive vocational education classes for qualified assistance recipients or other unemployed to take definite available employment which may be contingent upon such training."

Scope of Training:

Since their philosophy (+) assumes that the greatest opportunity for development of these programs lies in the area of semi-skilled and single-skilled occupations there are certain "general" restrictions. On the whole, however, the program is extremely flexible with regard to both content and the extent of training. For example: (1) Course titles need not be restricted to industrial occupations but shall be limited only by available employment opportunities. See Appendix B for list of the range of course offerings from 1952-1960. (2) Sessions may be operated during any time of the day or night on any days of the week. (3) In general, a plan of maximum operating intensity "may be training for six to eight hours per day for five or six days per week." A plan of minimum operating intensity "may be sessions for three hours per day for three days per week." (4) With the exception of Practical Nursing, all courses shall be limited to a maximum of six months duration for any one trainee. (+) (5) Failure to place in "paid employment" at least 60 percent of the enrolled trainees within 15 days of course separation will be cause for termination of the course. (6) Employment specifications will be determining factors in trainee recruitment. Trainee acceptance shall not be restricted by reason of race, religion, color, or physical handicap.

(+) As they point out, this is based on the fact that "adults cannot, for economic reasons, spend extended periods of time preparing for employment..."!

Fiscal Policy:

Cost items which are applicable to this program and, which will be reimbursed "when justified and approved" on a special application form are: salaries of essential personnel; travel of personnel on official business in connection with the program; consumable supplies--actually consumed--for the office, for instruction, and for janitorial and maintenance; communication, i.e., postage, telephone, printing, duplicating, advertising; insurance which includes compensation, retirement funds, plant and equipment protection; and overhead in the amount of five cents ($.05) per pupil hour of instruction!

> "Since this program is considered to be a fully reimbursable one, at no cost to the local district, tuition costs for enrollment are not a recognized charge."

Since the amount of the appropriation available is limited, priority is given to requests "in the order they are received", but, "with emphasis upon the relative need for training and available opportunities for employment."

(+) "Exceptions to this rule may be granted upon request to the Department of Public Instruction with appropriate justification of the purpose to be served by the exception."

Reference of trainees shall clear through the Pennsylvania State Employment Service and the Department of Public Assistance offices only! Finally, all items of production in the training program which are usable shall not be sold. They shall be donated to charitable institutions instead. Furthermore:

> "All such items are to be clearly identified that they are a product of the training program sponsered by the local school district conducting the program." (+)

Responsibility for the Program:

"These programs are established on a cooperative basis between the Local School District, Department of Public Instruction, Department of Public Assistance, and the Bureau of Employment Security. The Bureau of Employment Security must certify to the Department of Public Instruction that there are sufficient job opportunities and a sufficient number of unemployed people who can be trained to fill these jobs. This Bureau then screens the trainees and places them on the job after they have completed their training program. Trade and Industrial Education Office of the Department of Public Instruction is the administrative agency for the program." (+)

Purpose of the Program:

"To provide brief, intensive vocational training for unemployed adults over 18 years of age or legally out of school youth over 14 years of age. This training will be designed to equip recipients of public assistance or unemployment compensation with the basic skills and technical knowledge required for entrance into local community industry.

These concentrated, short unit courses provide a social service enabling the unemployed to become self-sufficient. The economic and sociological values acruing to the trainees are immeasurable, but the savings to the state, the increased purchasing power, and the increase of taxable income paid by the newly employed people can be very readily measured in terms of dollars and cents.

Although not an initial purpose, a subsequent result of training the unemployed is the increased interest and understanding of the public for the benefits of all education.

Ultimately, the purpose of the program is to extend and improve the Commonwealth's educational services available to the people."!! (+)

The Program in Action; Results:

What I have been saying before now about Pennsylvania mainly deals with the structure, or framework, they have established to deal with--what is to them--a crisis of major proportion. The real question is: Does it work in practice? If so, how does it work in practice? Has it done any good? How much does it cost? Is it worth the expense? Could it be applied elsewhere? For the answers to these and other questions, let us examine specific examples.

"Industries looking for new plant sites will find a unique feature in the educational program in Pennsylvania. The public school system can provide training in the skills needed to staff practically any type of industry, whether it be a long established operation or an entirely new plant. The Trade and Industrial Education Service of the Department of Public Instruction has a State-wide staff which is competent in analyzing training needs and organizing adequate training programs. This staff consists of 13 State supervisors and 76 local supervisors located strategically throughout the Commonwealth. The group has a long record of close cooperation with industry in solving training problems.

Within the immediate past, training programs have been operated for such diversified industries as: manufacture of shoes, hosiery, trailers, garments, electronics equipment, extrusion of polyethylene, and many others. In all cases a 'core group' of workers was trained before production was started in the plant." (*)

(1)"The experience of Robin Footwear Corporation of Mount Union, Pennsylvania, is a typical example of this service. This company, once located in another State, decided to relocate in Mount Union.

Mount Union is a pleasant but busy community of 5,000 located in scenic Huntingdon County in the central part of the State. There had never been a shoe industry in or around the community. Consequently, none of its people had any of the necessary shoemaking skills. As soon as the key equipment was installed, 75 unemployed persons were selected and training given on the various operations in the manufacture of shoes. All instruction was given on the trainees' own time. In ten weeks time, 150 were trained, each receiving from 50 to 150 hours of instruction, depending upon the operation being taught. Instruction was given in the actual production of shoes. The public schools furnished a director of the program, the instructors and the material. The director analyzed the job, established training procedures and set training goals and scheduled trainees into the program.

When the training program was completed, the public schools pulled out, taking with them all the material which had been purchased for training use and all finished products. In this particular program there were 10,000 pairs of finished shoes. These were distributed among the various State supported institutions for use of the inmates.

The plant then started production on the equipment available, using the first group that was trained. As additional equipment was installed additional trained people were put to work. Eventually, all but 10 of the 150 which were trained were put to work.

The value of this preproduction training program was best stated by Mr. Sam Rosen, President of the Robin Footwear Corporation...

> 'To establish a shoe factory in a community in which there had been none before and consequently where there were no skills in shoemaking would be a costly and difficult task. Without the training program, we probably could not have made the move to Mount Union.
> However, we are glad we did. The training program was well organized and efficiently operated.
> The people are concientious and intelligent and learned their skills quickly and well. We can recommend this service to anyone who has a problem similar to the one which we had'." (+)

(2)"Governor David L. Lawrence recently commended the Department of Public Instruction's Trade and Industrial Education Division for its efforts in training unemployed persons for jobs in the community of Sayre.

A vocational training program in Sayre, set up and administered by the Department of Public Instruction, has helped give jobs to 85 persons in the recently opened plant of a shoe manufacturing company.

The purpose of the training program was to train personnel for jobs in a new branch of the Treasure Shoe Manufacturing Company of New York which has opened in Sayre.

In a letter to Dr. Charles H. Boehm, Superintendent of Public Instruction, Governor Lawrence said, 'It is interesting to know what can be done when Departments of State Government pool their resources and work together for the betterment of the citizens we all serve.

"Enrollees in the program received instruction in the plant facilities, but the Department of Public Instruction furnished the instructors and materials. As a result, 85 formerly unemployed persons were placed in jobs paying from $50.00 to $80.00 per week.

'Nobody in the community of Sayre knew how to make shoes before the shoe company came into the area,' said William L. Cooper, Industrial Education Coordinator in the Department of Public Instruction, 'and our job was to train a portion of the local labor force in order to take advantage of this new employment opportunity.'

'The training program lasted five weeks,' Cooper explained, 'and its completion was time to coincide with the start of production in the newly constructed plant.

These people will earn a total of almost $250,000 annually, and this payroll will have a decided impact on the community of Sayre. Hiring of these people will also make necessary additional personnel such as stenographers, supervisors, laborers, and similar nonproductive employees.'

During the training period 7,740 pairs of shoes, valued at $2.00 per pair wholesale, were manufactured and given to the Commonwealth. The State therefore received value in goods to the amount of $15,480. These shoes are now in storage and will be shipped to State institutions for use when needed.

Cost of the program to the state was approximately $14,000, less than the total value of the shoes manufactured during the training period. (All the underlining is my own emphasis, acb)

Governor Lawrence also commended the Department of Commerce for helping attract the new industry to Sayre and stated, 'To the two departments that worked together on this project the people of Sayre and of Pennsylvania owe a debt of gratitude for stimulating the economy of one of the State's communities'."! (+)

Summary:

This, then, is the Pennsylvania story. Here we see a state that is hard hit economically because of several chronically depressed areas within its borders. It has taken the offensive against this menace. This is a priceless example of a State taking advantage of "enabling" legislation at the Federal level to the best advantage of the State. It has brought a large and diversified arsenal to bear on the problem. The Retraining of a work force suited especially for your own business, plus other equally attractive inducements is bound to attract new industries. As a matter of fact it has!

RESTATING THE PROBLEM:

At this point I would like to withdraw my frontal attack on this question and try, instead, a flanking movement. This would require changing the question from What Do We Know About Retraining to a new question such as What Do We Know: About Retraining. This play on words may seem senseless to you but the point is simply this. The most important purpose of this paper as I see it, is to arrive at some decisions, suggestions, and conclusions about retraining based on all the ingredients that will eventually go to make up the retraining package--if we decide to market it. The first ingredient to consider is the Depressed Areas themselves.

The Areas:

The B.E.S. scheme for classifying labor market areas is this. They establish three types of labor market areas in the United States: (1) Major, (2) Smaller, and by definition of the other two, (3) those not otherwise classified.[46] A Major area has a "central city" with a 1950 population of at least 50,000.[46] A Smaller area has a 1950 labor force of 15,000 or more.[46] Thus areas of under 15,000 are not classified in this scheme. Although the Major areas are a long way from the whole story,(+) for ease of handling we will be primarily looking at them. The 145 Major labor market areas account for nearly 60 percent of the civilian, noninstitutional population, 14 years and over, in the continental United States.[46] These are grouped into three classes.[46]

CLASS 1 - Areas with a consistently tight or balanced labor supply - demand situation. That is, areas whose classification remained at "A", "B", or "C" from January 1957 to May 1959.

(+) On this point see, "Task Force '61---Kennedy On The Bridge". Newsweek, January 9, 1961, p. 59. This article is only one of may in almost any conceivable publication which which touches on the idea that there is more to Depressed Areas than just the Major labor market areas. This article talks about "300 to 400 low-income rural areas".

CLASS 1 - Areas with substantial labor surplus during the recession, but which showed recovery in 1959. That is, areas whose classification fell to "D", "E", or "F" after the first quarter of 1957 but returned to "C" or better by May 1959.

CLASS 3 - Areas of Substantial Labor Surplus and/or Chronically Depressed Areas. That is, the areas whose classification either: (1) fell to "D" , "E", or "F" after the first quarter of 1957 and were still "D" or worse in May 1959--or--(2) was "D" or worse throughout the period January 1957 to May 1959.

Our focus here is only on Class 3 areas. Let us examine them in detail.

Class Three Areas:

Class 3 areas comprise 57 of the 145 Major labor market areas in the continental United States.[46] Of these, 38 could best be described as areas having substantial labor surplus because of the business downturn.[46] The other 19--from here on referred to as 3B areas--could best be described as Chronically Depressed Areas.[46] Although all Class 3 areas could use assistance, the first attention should be paid to just 3B areas. They have over 10% of the total class 3 population of working age: that is, 3 million people total![46] The analysis of Harold Kuptzin points out that the:

> "Employment trends and overall labor market conditions in each of the 17 chronic areas have been strongly influenced by developments in one or two industries." (29)

In fact, in 12 of the 17 areas a single industry, either in 1950 or 1959, --usually coal mining, textiles, autos, or machinery--accounted for more than 20% of local nonfarm employment.[29] In 4 of the 5 exceptions-coal mining in two and textiles in two-they had already been declining for some time prior to 1950.[29] Let us look briefly at specific examples.

(*) It may appear that my arithmetic is bad, my typewriterslipped, or I don't know what I am doing. The two areas we lost--from 19 to 17--is because of the differences in the dates of the two different studies. There were 19 in the first study--which actually was done later--and there were only 17 in this last study--which was done earlier.

Automobiles:[29]

In May 1959 automobile production was only 6% below May 1950, but the industry's employment totals had decreased almost twice as fast: more than 11% or 95,000 jobs. Table 1 shows the trend from 1953 to 1957.[29]

TABLE 1

Year	Average Yearly Employment	Production in Millions
1953	928,900	6.1
1955	903,800	7.9
1957	786,300	6.1

The effect on Detroit has been pretty marked, for nearly 130,000 automobile jobs--more than one-third of those in existence in May 1950--have disappeared during the past nine years. In May 1950 Detroit had 40% of the nation's total automotive employment; by 1955 this was down to 35%; by May 1959 it was down to 28%. Also affected, but not to the same degree, by this trend are Buffalo, New York; Flint, Michigan; Muskegon-Muskegon Heights; and Evansville, Indiana.

Steel:

Over the 9-year period from May 1950 to May 1959, monthly production in steel increased nationally by abour 35%, while employment moved up by around 6%. Three areas of Labor Surplus--Johnstown, Pa., Buffalo, N.Y., and the combined labor market area of Wheeling, W.Va. and Steubenville, Ohio--reported steel employment decreases ranging from 4% to 11% during the period 1950-1959! Pittsburgh, on the other hand, had an overall employment increase of 2.4%. It should be remembered, however, that this was only about one-third as much as the national average.

Textiles:[29]

Production in May 1959 was up more than 10% above the May 1950 level. In this same period employment declined 22.6%: 1,247,000 jobs to only 965,500 jobs. Table 2 shows the effect on Textile-dependent cities.[29]

Lawrence, Mass.	15,400	80.0
Utica-Rome, N.Y.	7,600	82.6

(+) The source (29) actually says between 6000 and 7000 jobs.

Coal:[29]

Production has declined in the past 9 years both more-than and less-than the presently stable point of about 15% below the May 1950 figure. The total employment stood at 479,000 jobs in that year. By May 1957 there were 222,000 less jobs! In 1958 another 45,000 jobs were lost. In effect this means there are currently 212,000 jobs left in coal mining; 267,000 have been lost. To put it another way there are 44.3% of the 1950 jobs still remaining in the coal mining sector of the economy: 55.7% are gone![+]

This is one way to look at Class 3 areas. Lets try a different one.

(+) The UMW has been forced to reduce its pension benefits from $100 to $75 a month as of Friday December 30, 1960 because of a "large decline in revenues brought on by 'economic conditions' throughout the country." Wisconsin State Journal, December 31, 1960, "Mine Workers Cut Pension $25 a month."

A different approach to studying Class 3 areas is to consider that they--like any other American area--are bound to have a certain amount of unemployment. By using this approach we will readily see that these chronic labor surplus areas generally were harder hit by the last recession--in fact by any other one--than the country as a whole. These 17 areas lost slightly more than One Quarter of a Million Jobs, (251,800), during the year ending May 1958.[33] This 10.1% decline in these areas was nearly 2½ times as sharp as the national average decline of 4.2 percent for the same period. To illustrate this let us turn to the New England Region. The closing of a plant by Textron Inc. caused so much protest that a Congressional Investigation was held in 1948.[33] The publicity--among other things--led the company to support and initiate effective redevelopment plans. Later this was played up in a big way as the best approach to getting the Depressed Area job done: community plus industry self help: a kind of "operation bootstrap"! Overlooked is the amount of heat the Congressional investigation generated. The point is that this is a special case. Manchester, Lawrence, Lowell, Fall River, New Bedford, and Providence didn't fair so well. Table 3 seems to illustrate very nicely the effect upon Depressed Areas of a cyclical rise in unemployment from a high base of chronic localized unemployment.[33]

To summarize Class 3 areas then, we can say they are characterized by: (1) being largely dependent upon one or two industries, which either move away or are declining; (2) they thus have a sizable base of unemployment on which any economic downturn builds to make the situation chronic. Additionally, class three areas accounted for 1.1 million unemployed in the spring of 1959--nearly one-third of national unemployment--yet at the same time they represent only one-fourth of the nation's population and labor force. Their rate of unemployment was 6.3 percent; both class 1 and class 2 had rates of 4.9 percent! As a final characteristic, these areas are really few in number, for although at least one Major or Smaller area with chronic unemployment has been identified with each of 22 states, the 17 Major mainland chronic areas are concentrated in eight states. Pennsylvania has five of these areas and Massachusetts has four![29]

Class One Areas v. Class Three Areas:[1 & 28 & 46]

There are two types of comparisons that can be made between class one areas and class three areas. The first type is a comparison of the mix of jobs and the mix of workers.

The mix of jobs in class 1 areas is 50% Government, Trade, and Service, and 20% Manufacturing. The class 3 mix of jobs is only 40% in Government, Trade and Service, but 34% in manufacturing. The percent of people in the labor force over 35 years of age was: class 3, 63%; class 1, 59%. On the other hand the percent of people in the labor force under 25 years of age was: class 3, only 15.5%; class 1, 22.3%! The sharpest difference was among the boys who usually go to school and work part-time---16 and 17 year olds. There were 20% less in the class 3 labor force than there were in class ones. Apparently they don't even look for work in a Depressed Area!

The second type of comparison is concerned with the unemployed. Are they from the same mold, and the only difference is that there are more of them? I am convinced that they are different. Class 3 areas accounted for over 40% of the total national-long-term-unemployed, that is, those out of work over six months! At the same time they accounted for only 25% of the total national-short-term-unemployed, that is, those out of work less than one month! Among the unemployed in these two areas, over 40% of those in class 3 had previously held jobs in manufacturing; only 20% of those in class 1 held a manufacturing job before. Class 1 had much more of its unemployment among married women. Class 3 had much more of its unemployed among married men who were also the heads of families. In fact, unemployment percentages among men from 25-64 years of age was 45% for class 3 but only 36% for class 1. Although the rate of teenage unemployment was the same--(17%+)--for both classes, only 16% of class 3 unemployment was among teenagers, while 25% of class 1 unemployment was among teenagers. Finally, there was a higher proportion of both semi-skilled and unskilled among both employed and unemployed in class 3.

Profile of The Typical Depressed Area Unemployed Worker: (+)

Can you make a good case for there being a typical unemployed person in a Depressed Area? Basically the answer is yes. For example Long,[50] in speaking about the prosperity month of March, 1957, points out that the half of the civilian labor force with less than four years of high school suffered 70 percent of the unemployment. College graduates, who are 9 percent of the labor force had 1.6 percent of the unemployment. Or in another example he says

> "In prosperity years, about one-fourth of the unemployed suffered nearly two-thirds of the aggregate unemployment, and half of the unemployed suffered 85 - 88 percent of the unemployment." (50)

(+) See For Example: 7, 13, 17, 19, 30, 36, 37, 44, 46, 48, 49.

With these ideas in mind--plus considerable other evidence--I feel it is safe to generalize and say that the unemployed worker in a Depressed Area is either quite old-(over 50)-or quite young-(under 25). He is most likely to be "blue-collar", a semi-skilled or unskilled factory, mine or construction worker. He has had little schooling-obviously less than high school-and quite probably eighth grade or less. He has probably exhausted his U.I.! (+)

Exhaustion of Unemployment Compensation:

This leads us to a study of exhaustion of unemployment benefits in Lansing, Michigan.[10] It has a labor force of about 90,000, and it is largely a labor market for Government-(the state capital)-and Education-(the University) It does, however, have 28,000 workers in manufacturing of whom 75% or 21,000 are in automobile plants. From August 1957 to August 1958, Lansing had a rate of unemployment of at least 9%. The study selected 2,528 "first payment" recipients of whom 70% were auto workers. Of these, 851--(or a ratio of 33.7%)--exhausted their benefits. Seventy percent of the exhaustees were also auto workers! Michigan unemployment benefits, by the way, run from 9½ to 26 weeks.

The study concluded that: (1) Those who have a full 26 weeks of benefits had lower exhaustion than those with less than 26 weeks benefits; (2) There is an inverse relationship between age and exhaustees--except for those over 65. That is, the younger people exhaust more; (3) Semi-skilled and unskilled have the same exhaustion ratio: high! The ratio for skilled claimants though is significantly below average. Professional and managerial exhaustions were low. Clerical and sales people tended to have relatively short periods of employment before their claims period. This lead to shorter benefits and thus higher exhaustion. Thus, the women, younger, and higher skilled had much the better employment records. It is no wonder they are not the ones we find in the Depressed Areas!

(+) See For Example: 3, 10, 11, 12, 20, 21, and 42.

SUMMARY:

Thus it is clear to me that there is a problem with Depressed Area unemployed. They are living in an economically retreating section of the U.S.! Jobs are tough there even in good times, and they are terrible in recessions. The younger, better skilled workers have deserted the sinking ship, but: they have superior products to sell; they have more productive years left; they have less dependents to worry about, and move; and change isn't so hard for them to adapt to. The guy who is left behind may have property and a house he has built up over the years. Can he, and should he, be asked to abandon it without a fair return? But who would want to buy a house in a Depressed Area? You can't get a decent price. A man would want what he has put into it, but the current market value is almost zero. Should he bear the loss? Quite probably he is much too broke to afford to move anyway. Where does he get gas money, or plane or train fare. How does he pay for temporary quarters until he gets a new job? How does he--and his family--eat during the transition period? And then, of course, what are his chances of getting another job. He is unskilled or at best semi-skilled. He has little education. Should he, and can he be helped by retraining? Even if the answer is yes, who decides what he should be retrained for? That is, who has the final decision on whether he must retrain for one specific job; whether he must move to a particular area, and; whether he must take a certain job? There is, after all, an enormous social cost involved in all of this in addition to the financial burden.

What is the answer? From the viewpoint of the people involved, it seems clear something must be done. Just for the moment, however, let us be quite realistic about this whole thing. Let us look at it from a purely selfish point of view. What's in it for us?

What's In It For Us?

The number of work-days lost in fiscal 1958--by cause--looked something like this.[47] Table 4 tells the story.

TABLE 4

THE FOUR MAJOR CAUSES OF WORK-DAYS LOST DURING FISCAL 1958

Causes	Work-Days Lost
Strikes	23 million
On the job accidents (excluding death)	55 million
Illness and Injury	544 million
Unemployment	1.1 BILLION

In fact, the work days lost from Strikes alone since World War II were less than one-half of the 1958 unemployment losses![47] Yet Strikes merit legislation.

How can we--I mean the rest of the employed--fail to do something about it? At this stage of the battle between the economies of Soviet Russia and the United States, we need total production; not something less because it is cheaper. The point would seem to be that it is cheaper to do something about it.(+) The alternatives should make it amply clear What's In It For Us!

Recommendations:

Without hesitation I suggest as one part of the solution to the problem of Depressed Area unemployment, a full-scale retraining program. The concept of retraining, however, should be modified. Although retraining can and should be made available to all those in Depressed Areas who could make proper use of it, I feel there are clearly defined limits to how far such a program can and should be pushed. Being reasonably cold and objective, once again, let us forget the "human factors" involved and ask: Why retrain a janitor of 55, a coal-miner of 51, an auto-worker of 62, or a textile worker of 57? To begin with, is it fair to other janitors, coal miners, auto workers, textile workers, and all the other people now working, to ask them to pay for the improvement of the "economic position" of competitors? Isn't this like telling a janitor who is now working for $45.00 a week that if he had only had the foresight to move to a depressed area and be laid off he too could be retrained for a better job? I think the answer is yes, and this is not a bad argument against retraining! Furthermore, it isn't the only one. Let us suppose we do retrain the type of people listed above. In a few years they will be out of the labor force. One could almost argue that part of the problem would go away as soon as they retire; why not wait? Even this is not totally an idle argument. But of even more importance is the question which is raised as to whether it may not be something next to impossible to retrain 14 15

(+) See For Example: 28 and 35. Also see the section on Pennsylvania!

18 & 36
older, lower educated people in jobs they will be able to obtain and hold! To meet these objections--and others--is the reason I offer a different idea of retraining. Why not retrain the young people of 25, 30, and 35 instead? It is easier--in the name of the whole society--to advantage the younger people in our labor force at the expense of the others. Secondly, they have a much greater number of productive years ahead of them. Finally, they quite probably already have more education upon which the retraining can be built. More difficult? Undoubtedly! But isn't it also more sensible? I think so. We certainly would face serious objections and problems if such a scheme were attempted. At the same time it may well be that what we need is a different set of objections and problems to deal with. The old ones are, at best, old.
7 & 27

To follow up on my suggestion let us take a look at a survey published in Nations Business which points out what kinds of jobs are going without enough takers despite the considerable unemployment in our economy. They are tool design, mathmeticians, accountants, engineers, higher-type (technical) clerical, higher skilled machinists, welders, cabinet makers, plumbers, junior and senior physicists, trained statisticians, health and other such professional people, and teachers, just to name a few.[26] Clearly a 59 year old coal miner may not be able to make the transition from coal mining to senior physicist, but a junior physicist could! The next man down the job hierarchy could move up a notch and so forth. The coal miners son--probably a high school graduate--could also be advanced from his present job given half a chance. What I am suggesting then is this: (1) Wherever possible each skill-level be advanced one notch, with private and public financing of the retraining where necessary; (2) slotting into the vacancies created where a subordinate can't be retrained to fill the next higher level job, all those young retrainable people who aren't fully utilizing their potential; (3) leaving the "lower-level skill jobs" for the older, less skilled, less educated, depressed area unemployed person, rather than asking him to make the "giant" step. It seems to me such a program would have many advantages, but if nothing else it may create room at the bottom for the Depressed Area unemployed. This would be one part of my proposed solution. The rest follows.

Running along the same lines as retraining are the "fringe" elements I feel must be dealt with to make such a program workable. Even a retrained man in a Depressed Area with no job prospect and no money to move, is worth but little more than an untrained man. Let us wake up to the fact that Depressed Areas are not a local problem to be met in the manner suggested in Footnote 2 (+)

\- - -

(+) On this point, see also, U.S. News & World Report, January 9, 1961, pp. 101-103, "Where Workers Will Accept Lower Pay To Get Jobs." This whole approach suggests the underlying idea that higher wages are responsible for unemployment. See on this, St. Louis Post Dispatch, December 28, 1960 reporting on a speech made by Clarence D. Long.

in the editorial taken from Life Magazine. The story of the poor starving, unemployed worker who went to the bank for a loan but was refused because he didn't have any money in the bank for collateral is being retold on a National scale. Who else--but a man without money in the bank--needs money? Who else but a local Depressed Area needs outside financial assistance? In short, the problem is National, not local. If the country were to build a dam in one of these areas it would see to it that the displaced people received full-value for their homes and property. If one of these areas were to be hit with a flood or tornado the whole nation-public and private sectors-would pour relief into rehabilitating the area and the people. These areas are no different, they are no better off. Is it too much to ask that they be treated as a National emergency too? I propose that homes and property be purchased at a fair price, transportation, meals, living expenses, be paid for these "retrained movers" until they are reestablished in the new area with a job. (+)

Even this is not the end of my proposals. Recognizing-what I consider to be the fact-that future growth in our economy must depend, in a much greater degree than previously, on the so-called "public" sector rather than on the "private" sector-motivates the rest of my plans. First, I would wish for a full scale attempt to build enough schools to handle all of the children as they should be taken care of. Second, in conjunction with the first, I desire a sizable aid to education program to accomplish such short-run things as keeping present teachers and enticing many more competent people to return to--or prepare for--a teaching career, but with the long-run goal designed to eliminate almost any person being able to escape into the labor force with less than a high school degree. These two moves alone would provide additional employment opportunities. Third, and last, I submit that we desperately need a highway network capable of handling the present day traffic. This is a need, not a make-work scheme. This certainly wouldn't hurt employment!

(+) Even if it were willing, I feel private industry couldn't handle such a gigantic undertaking. For examples where they have indulged in some small amount of this, See for example: 8, 23, 38; also see report of Lockheed Aircraft's moving 1800 employees over 400 miles (in) Industrial Relations News: A Weekly Newsletter for the Industrial Relations Field. Oct. 1959.

So far I have talked only about moving workers to jobs with an intermediate stop for retraining. But it seems reasonable to me--on the basis of some of the descriptions of depressed areas(+)--that they need not be evacuated and made into cattle-grazing land. In these "better" areas then, we should relocate old industries and locate new industries. Perhaps we will have to pay them or forgive their taxes, or use the British "positive" approach that a new building must be approved before it can go up.(*) This too meets my approval.

It may be argued, and rightly so, that these schemes are naive and radical. To this I can only say that I believe in them; I feel that in some measure they can be made to work. I sincerely advocate them. It may also be argued that they will cost money--lots of it. I agree with this. It should be clear that I do not favor wholesale spending for spending's sake--I am not the "last of the big time spenders." At the same time I am not opposed to big spending. A road, school, postoffice; a better teacher, accountant, secretary; or a worker producing at full capacity instead of standing idle on the "Dole" does not represent wasted money. If General Electric invests in a new machine or additional buildings this is considered investment and progress: they are exchanging the asset money for physical assets; this is not waste. If General "Ike" invests government money in new schools, roads, retraining unemployed workers, etc., is this, by definition, waste? I think the answer is clear.

It really is time we did something about Depressed Area unemployment. Retraining could be part of the answer. For the rest of the solution I offer "Bartlett's Law"(#): money extracted internally from citizens which is respent internally for citizens does not have to be wasteful use of said money.

(+) See for example: 1, 13, 14.
(*) This would tend to "persuade" people to locate in depressed areas.
(#) I feel certain I need not say this is not my own original thought!

CONCLUSION:

Perhaps I have said it badly. To state it again: I feel that the problem of Depressed Area Unemployment is serious; retraining may be part of a solution, but it is a far cry from being the total answer. Perhaps the easiest way to conclude is to quote from Long who said it so well in a slightly different context and from a different take-off point:

> "...the performance of our economy in providing high employment under rapid growth and stable prices would be best enhanced, not by increasing the aggregate demand for labor through spending, but rather by improving the quality and availability of the prosperity unemployed, in order to qualify them for the kind of jobs the economy can provide in time of peacetime prosperity without inflation.
> This is not so simple as increasing aggregate demand through spending. It means fighting unemployment on many levels: by improving the education and training of the young and unskilled; by restoring the usefulness of the middle aged through rehabilitation and replacement of obsolete skills; by removing barriers to the employment of the old, the negro, and even the female worker; by providing more job information to workers of all ages and extending more encouragement to move to new occupations, industries, and areas; by eliminating the temptation of some workers to malinger in order to collect unemployment insurance; by modifying the unsettling effects of bad weather and irregular buying and selling habits in creating seasonal variations in employment; by moving new capital and enterprise to depressed areas; by improving the efficiency of small and marginal firms, in order to reduce the high rate of business deaths that occur even during normal times; and by curbing the monopoly power of giant firms and unions--a power which enables them to seize on improvements in business as an opportunity less to expand production and employment than to raise wages and prices."!! (50)*

The above, in large part, is what I have been trying to say!

* Note: The underlining is my own emphasis. I also want to make it perfectly clear that I do not believe that giant unions by any stretch of the imagination possess a monopoly power. I submit that it does not meet the necessary conditions precedent to even qualify for such a designation. Others feel the same way, Barbash, for example. SECTION 501(C)	(6)
ADDRESS INQUIRIES AND FILE RETURNS DISTRICT DIRECTOR OF INTERNAL REV	Manhattan
ACCOUNTING PERIOD ENDING	December 31

Gentlemen:

On the basis of your stated purposes and the understanding that your operations will continue as evidenced to date or will conform to those proposed in your ruling application, we have concluded that you are exempt from Federal income tax under the provisions of the Internal Revenue Code section indicated above. Any changes in operations from those described, or in your character or purposes, must be reported immediately to your District Director for consideration of their effect upon your exempt status. You must also report any change in your name or address.

You are not required to file Federal income tax returns so long as you retain an exempt status, unless you are subject to the tax on unrelated business income imposed by section 511 of the Code, in which event you are required to file Form 990-T. You are required to file an information return, Form 990, annually on or before the 15th day of the fifth month after the close of your annual accounting period indicated above.

You are liable for the taxes imposed under the Federal Insurance Contributions Act (social security taxes); and for the tax imposed under the Federal Unemployment Tax Act if you have four or more individuals in your employ.

Any questions concerning excise, employment or other Federal taxes should be submitted to this office.

This is a determination letter.

Very truly yours,

MEMORANDUM FOR MR. DRESSNER

The Ford Foundation

March 27, 1968

The purpose of this memorandum is to outline certain legal consequences of making grants to organizations which do not have, and may not qualify for, written rulings by the Treasury to the effect that they are tax-exempt organizations described in Section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

Section 501(a) of the Code exempts from Federal income tax organizations described in Section 501(c)(3); viz., organizations

> ". . . . organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, testing for public safety, literary, or educational purposes . . . , no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private shareholder or individual . . . ."

The Foundation's Articles of Incorporation also limit the permissible operations of the Foundation to similar purposes; viz.,

> ". . . scientific, educational, and charitable purposes, all for the public welfare . . . ."

Neither the Code nor the Foundation's Articles of Incorporation require that grants be made only to organizations which have received Treasury exemption letters. Thus the Foundation is not prohibited from making such grants, and the Foundation will not for that reason alone jeopardize its tax exemption.

I understand that in the past the Foundation has limited its grants to organizations with exemption letters (or, in the case of some foreign organizations, clear proof that they would be entitled to such a letter). Since an organization which has such a letter is presumably organized and operated for exempt purposes, this policy has acted as a built-in safeguard that the grant would be used only for permissible and exempt purposes. Furthermore, it is my understanding that the Treasury's audit policy has been that it will not challenge an organization's Section 501(c)(3) exemption if that organization has made grants only to organizations with exemption letters, regardless of whether the granted funds were in fact used for exempt purposes (assuming that the grantor organization did not have prior knowledge of a proposed non-exempt use of the grant). Thus there is a practical advantage in making grants only to grantees with exemption letters.

On the other hand, as indicated above, the Foundation is not prohibited from making a grant to anyone so long as it is made for exempt purposes. Furthermore, I understand that the Treasury's audit policy has been that it will not challenge an organization's Section 501(c)(3) exemption where grants are made to organizations without exemption letters, provided that the granted funds are in fact used for exempt purposes. In effect, the Treasury thus holds the grantor responsible for the actual application of the granted funds. In view of that policy, so long as appropriate procedures are followed to insure that any grant made by the Foundation to an organization not qualified for an exemption letter is in fact devoted to exempt purposes, there is no reason why the Foundation cannot make such a grant. If the Foundation does so, however, it should specify clearly and in detail the purposes for which the granted funds are to be used. General purpose grants to such an organization, of course, should not be made. It would also be appropriate to obligate the grantee contractually to return the amount of the granted funds to the Foundation if the terms of the grant are violated. In addition, the Foundation should have the right to monitor the use of the granted funds in order to insure to the extent possible that the granted funds are in fact used for exempt purposes.

Finally, it should be noted that the Treasury Regulations provide that > ". . . An organization will be regarded as 'operated exclusively' for one or more exempt purposes only if it engages primarily in activities which accomplish one or more of such exempt purposes specified in section 501(c)(3). An organization will not be so regarded if more than an insubstantial part of its activities is not in furtherance of an exempt purpose." Treas. Reg. § 1.501(c)(3)-1(c)(1).

The implication of that Regulation is that an organization may devote an "insubstantial" part of its funds to non-exempt purposes without losing its Section 501(c)(3) exemption.

In the past I understand that the Treasury has followed an informal policy that if not more than ten percent of an organization's grants were to organizations without exemption letters, it would not normally question the exemption. Thus even if it turned out that certain grants made by the Foundation were not in fact used for exempt purposes, in all probability the Foundation would not be jeopardizing its Section 501(c)(3) exemption if the amount of grants so misused was minimal in relation to the total amount of grants.

Mr. Basil Whiting
The Ford Foundation

Dear Basil:

Enclosed you will find the revised Georgia Kraft proposal. It took a little longer than I had hoped because of Kraft's discussions with the Southern paper industry around the vehicle of funding.

While discussions are not completed, it looks quite positive and I am hopeful that the industry will sponsor the program through its non-profit arm.

In the meantime, we look forward to moving along to the final review. Needless to say, we are excited about this program since it attacks the problem of upgrading full force.

Looking forward to seeing you soon.

Dear Mr. Locke:

Thank you for your letter of July 23rd indicating interest on the part of the American Paper Institute in sponsoring a pilot training project to be conducted at the Georgia Kraft Company under contract to the U. S. Research and Development Corporation. We are indeed happy to learn that API will be interested in sponsoring this worthwhile project.

Before progressing any further, it would be useful for me to talk with you or your representative on this project to nail down the details of API's involvement, particularly your plans for monitoring, evaluation, and publicity.

Perhaps you or your representative could call me at 573-5047 and we could have a lunch here at the Foundation in the near future to go over these matters. I'll look forward to hearing from you soon.

Dear Emory:

I am sending along to you a xeroxed copy of the most recent version of U.S. R & D's proposal for an upgrading program at Georgia Kraft Company. Some additional correspondence is included.

As I mentioned on the phone, the details of Georgia Kraft's commitments to upgrading are not clear. I spent a brief two hour visit with them during a hectic day when they were involved in union negotiations. I left with a "feeling" that they were sincere and would indeed be able to upgrade the bulk of their employees with few problems either from the unions or from their supervisors. Hence, I don't think the situation is serious enough to call for you or your staff making a special trip. But if you are in the area, or it is easy to do, it would be helpful to have my "judgement" confirmed.

Many thanks.

Dear Mr. Rock:

Many thanks for spending so much time with me during what must have been a very hectic and busy day for you. Let me also thank you for allowing me the use of your company plane. It made things much more manageable.

Now that I know what the inside of a paper mill looks like, I'll feel much more confident when I sit down with William Gittens and Floyd Flom on Thursday, August 8th, to talk about their end of the program.

Incidentally, one of our allied consultants on labor matters (who works in part for the Southern Regional Council) may be in your area sometime in early or mid-August. I hope you will be able to see him if he is able to stop by at that time.

Once again thanks and I hope to be in contact with you again soon.

TO FBA MEMBERS -

SPECIAL BULLETIN
EQUAL EMPLOYMENT DEVELOPMENTS

International Paper Company and the International Brotherhood of Pulp, Sulphite and Paper Mill Workers, United Papermakers and Paperworkers and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers have amended the seniority provisions of their labor contracts covering the company's Southern Kraft mills to assure equality in job seniority for Negro employees.

The new pact, ratified by more than a two to one (2-1) vote of the rank and file membership of fifty-two (52) locals and the three (3) unions replaces job seniority with mill seniority for determining priority when Negroes are moving into or within previously predominant white lines of progression. It also provides that transfer and advancement qualifications will be no higher for Negro employees than they were for white employees hired at the time the Negroes were hired.

It also provides that rates paid Negroes availing themselves of the new opportunities will generally be no lower than their current wage rates, regardless of the contract rate for the job into which they transfer.

Union and company spokesmen hailed the agreement "as a vindication of the collective bargaining process" and expressed hope that "future problems involving similar matters could be worked out by collective bargaining without resorting to lengthy litigation".

Secretary of Labor Willard Wirtz called the amendment of the collective bargaining agreement "a significant breakthrough in our national efforts to insure equality of opportunity for all our citizens. While equitable seniority changes have been achieved by other companies, the overriding importance of this pact is that it was reached through the vital process of collective bargaining."

Copies of the new agreement are available upon request to this office.

COMPLAINT

I.

Jurisdiction of this Court is invoked pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §2000e-5(f) and 28 U.S.C. §§ 2201 and 2202. This is a suit in equity authorized and instituted pursuant to Title VII of the Act of Congress known as "The Civil Rights Act of 1964," 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000e et seq. The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked to secure protection of and to redress deprivation of rights secured by (a) 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000e et seq., providing for injunctive and other relief against racial discrimination in employment and (b) 42 U.S.C. § 1981, providing for the equal rights of all persons in every state and territory within the jurisdiction of the United States. Jurisdiction of this Court is also invoked pursuant to 29 U.S.C. §§ 151 et seq., based on violations of the duty of fair representation owed to plaintiffs and the class they represent.

II.

Plaintiffs bring this action on their own behalf and on behalf of all other persons similarly situated pursuant to Rule 23 (b) (2), F.R.C.P. The class which plaintiffs represent is composed of Negro persons who are employed, or might be employed, by the Georgia Kraft Company, at its Rome, Georgia, plant, and who are members, or might become members of Local Nos. 804 and 805, International Brotherhood of Pulp, Sulphite and Papermill Workers, AFL-CIO, and/or of Local No. 654, United Papermakers and Paperworkers, AFL-CIO, which locals are in Rome, Georgia, and who have been and continue to be or might be adversely affected by the practices complained of herein. There are common questions of law and fact affecting the rights of the members of this class who are and continue to be limited, classified, and discriminated against in ways which deprive and tend to deprive them of equal employment opportunities and otherwise adversely affect their status as employees because of their race or color. These persons are so numerous that joinder of all members is impracticable. A common relief is sought. The interests of the class are adequately represented by plaintiffs. Defendants have acted or refused to act on grounds generally applicable to the class.

III.

(a) Plaintiff LINELL LONG is a Negro citizen of the United States and of the State of Georgia, residing in Rome, Georgia. He is employed by defendant Georgia Kraft Company at their Rome, Georgia, plant, and is President of Local 805, International Brotherhood of Pulp, Sulphite, and Papermill Workers, AFL-CIO.

(b) Plaintiff JOHNIE PINKARD is a Negro citizen of the United States and of the State of Georgia, residing in Rome, Georgia. He is employed at defendant Georgia Kraft Company's Rome, Georgia, plant and is a member in good standing of the aforementioned Local 805.

(c) Plaintiff JOE L. McELROY is a Negro citizen of the United States and of the State of Alabama, residing in Coder Bluff, Alabama. He is employed at defendant Georgia Kraft Company's Rome, Georgia, plant, and is a member in good standing of the aforementioned Local 805.

IV.

(a) Defendant GEORGIA KRAFT COMPANY is a subsidiary of the Mead Corporation, with headquarters in Chillicothe, Ohio, doing business in the State of Georgia and the cities of Rome and Macon therein. The Company operates and maintains plants in Rome and Macon which manufacture container board and related products. The Company is an employer within the meaning of 42 U.S.C. §2000e-(b) in that the Company is engaged in an industry affecting commerce and employs at least 100 employees.

(b) Defendant INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF PULP, SULPHITE AND PAPERMILL WORKERS, AFL-CIO, (hereinafter IBPS) is the certified collective bargaining agent for certain employees at Georgia Kraft's plant in Rome, Georgia. The IBPS does business throughout the United States. Its principal office is located in Fort Edward, New York. The IBPS is engaged in an industry which affects interstate commerce. It has over fifty members employed by Georgia Kraft in Rome, Georgia.

(c) Defendant Local 804 of the IBPS is the local union of the IBPS that represents white employees at Georgia Kraft's Rome plant. Its offices are in Rome, Georgia. It is engaged in an industry affecting interstate commerce.

(d) Defendant Local 805 of the IBPS is the local union of the IBPS that represents Negro employees at Georgia Kraft's Rome plant. Its offices are in Rome, Georgia. It is engaged in an industry affecting commerce. On information and belief, plaintiffs allege that Local 305, IBPS, is not adverse to the interests of palintiffs in this action. It is named as a defendant for the purpose of bringing all parties in the Rome plant to the collective bargaining agreement between Georgia Kraft and the unions before the Court.

(e) Defendant UNITED PAPERMAKERS AND PAPERWORKERS, AFL-CIO, (hereinafter UPAP) is the certified collective bargaining agent for certain employees at Georgia Kraft's Rome plant. The UPAP does business throughout the United States. The UPAP is engaged in an industry affecting interstate commerce. It has over fifty members employed by Georgia Kraft at its Rome plant.

Any Negroes to date?

(f) Local 654 of the UPAP is the local union of the UPAP that represents white employees at Georgia Kraft's Rome plant. Its offices are in Rome, Georgia. It is engaged in an industry that affects interstate commerce.

V.

The Georgia Kraft Company maintains a pattern and practice of segregation on the basis of race in its locker room facilities in its Rome, Georgia, plant. Lockers are assigned by the defendant Company without giving a choice to the employee. As a result of the pattern and practice of said Company, all Negro employees have their lockers placed together in one room, and all white employees have their lockers together in another room. There are but a token few employees of the minority race in either locker room whose majority is made up of persons of the opposite race.

VI.

The Georgia Kraft Company maintains on its property and subsidizes through financial and other aid a recreational

IX.

As a result of Georgia Kraft's tests, only 3 Negroes have been able to gain access to skilled jobs at the Rome plant, among 296 white employees. Only 28 Negroes have gained access to semi-skilled jobs among 224 white employees. None of the 48 female employees are Negro. The plant still contains, in effect, racially separate lines of progression within departments.

X.

Said tests are not professionally developed tests within the meaning of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Of the three tests in Georgia Kraft's battery, one test was not validated for any jobs, and thus bears no correlation between test results and job performance. Minimum passing scores for persons who take the tests are based solely on the performance of white persons; the validating group did not and has not included members of the Negro race. Cut-off scores are not validated for Negroes. In addition, some of the skills measured by said tests are not required for numerous jobs available in Georgia Kraft's Rome plant. As a result of defendant's testing policy, Negroes are barred from admission to even those semi-skilled jobs for which they may be amply qualified.

XI.

Giving tests to Negroes, such as the named plaintiffs, who worked at the plant for many years without prior testing, discriminates unfairly against those Negroes who were employed prior to May 15, 1963, as compared to whites also hired prior to May 15, 1963. The requirements of the tests parallel the skills learned and taught in schools, not skills maintained in unskilled work at defendant's plant. Thus, those who took said tests when

cf to I-DP agreement

when fresh out of school, as did new white employees prior to May 15, 1963, have an unfair and discriminatory advantage over those who only were allowed to take the tests after being on the job for many years.

XII.

Each of the defendant local unions maintains and pursues a custom, policy, and practice of limiting and conditioning memberships on the ground of race or color, with but token integration. Said all-white unions locals have in the past and continue at the present to seek advantages for their members, at the cost and expense of the Negro members of local no. 805 IBPS. These advantages to whites include, but are not limited to, wages, hours, opportunities for promotion, and access to supervisory positions. Those jobs which are available to Negroes in the Rome plant of Georgia Kraft are, virtually without exception, lower paying than any jobs available and filled by whites in said plant, as a result of the discriminatory lines of progression agreed to and maintained in the contracts between Georgia Kraft and the defendant unions. In addition, the policy of job seniority, instead of mill seniroity, agreed to and practiced by the defendant unions and Georgia Kraft discriminates against members of the Negro race, represented by the named plaintiffs, who have been in the plant for a long period, but who, because of discrimination based on race, have been able to gain experience in only a few jobs or types of jobs; whereas, white employees and union members have been able to gain experience at many types of jobs, which experience, in turn, makes them eligible for promotion in accordingly many more types of jobs than Negroes.

Cf I-P Settlement

XIII.

Each defendant local unions and defendant Georgia Kraft have discriminated against the named plaintiffs and members of their class and race by placing white employees into the Wood Department of the Rome plant in newly created jobs as "Scalers," which jobs are more highly paid than any jobs held in said department by Negroes, and which jobs provide more rapid access to promotions than any jobs held by Negroes in said Department. Plaintiff LONG presently holds a position in said Wood Department, wherein the new white job was created. Said job was created without proper written notice to all the parties to the collective bargaining agreement, with local 805, IBPS, not being properly informed.

XIV.

Because of the customs, policies and practices of the defendant unions and Georgia Kraft, Negro employees at the Rome plant are not placed in any positions wherein they supervise any white employees. However, all Negro employees are under the direct or indirect supervision of white employees.

XV.

The failure of the defendants to actually merge or integrate formerly segregated lines of progression, which lines had been officially racially segregated prior to May 15, 1963, and specifically, the confinement of Negro employees in unskilled jobs and the refusal to allow Negro employees to move up a line of progression into functionally related jobs that had formerly been reserved exclusively to whites, or allow Negroes to supervise whites, is a discrimination against Negro employees in violation of §703(a) of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. §2000e-2(a).

XVI.

The continuation of a promotional system which takes account only of service in a particular job and gives no credit for years of plant service favors white employees to whom higher level jobs have always been open. As such, this seniority and promotional system is intended to or has the effect of perpetuating the lesser status of Negro employees and hindering their access to higher level jobs, all of which is a discrimination against Negro employees in violation of §703(a) of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. §2000e-2(a).

XVII.

The requirement that Negro employees seeking transfer or promotion to jobs that had been formerly reserved for white employees pass a battery of pre-employment tests that said Negro employees were not required to take prior to their entrance into the Company, and that certain whites were not required to take before said tests were introduced into the plant, constitutes a discriminatory barrier against Negro employees in violation of §703(a) of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. §2000e-2(a). In these circumstances the tests used by Georgia Kraft are designed, intended, or used to discriminate against Negroes on account of race or color in violation of §703(h) of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. §2000e-2(h).

XVIII.

The tests used by Georgia Kraft for new applicants and employees seeking transfer to formerly all white jobs are not professionally developed ability tests within the meaning of §703(h) of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, for the reasons stated in paragraph X, supra. Further, for the reasons stated in said paragraph X, the administration of these tests is designed, intended, or used to discriminate against Negroes on account of race or color. For these reasons, the testing of new applicants and employees seeking transfer to formerly all white jobs is in violation of §703(a) and (h) of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. §2000e-2(a), (h).

XIX.

Defendants IBPS and UPAP, and Locals 804, 805, and 654 have violated and continue to violate their duty of fair representation imposed on them by the National Labor Relations Act in that they have acquiesced and/or joined in the unlawful and discriminatory practices complained of in paragraphs V through XIV, supra, and they have failed to protect the Negro members of the Company from the discriminatory policies and practices. The Company has knowingly participated in or acquiesced in said violation of the duty of fair representation. At all times material herein, the named unions and locals have been the certified recognized representatives under the National Labor Relations Act of the plaintiffs and the class they represent, and, as such, have had the duty to impartially and fairly represent the interests of plaintiffs and their class.

XX.

All of the discriminations complained of herein are ongoing and continuous in their effect upon plaintiffs and their class.

XXI.

4/22/66 Complaints Initiated with EEOC

(a) On or about April 22, 1966, within 90 days of being discriminated against, named plaintiffs LONG and PINKARD filed written complaints, under oath, with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, charging discrimination in testing and promotion against the Georgia Kraft Company. On or about March 6, 1968, said plaintiffs were notified that the Commission found

3/6/68 ~~Probable~~ reasonable cause

Notice 7/13/68 Had complained not achieved reasonable cause to believe that defendant Georgia Kraft Company had committed a violation of the Act. On or about July 13, 1968, plaintiffs LONG and PINKARD received letters from the Commission advising that defendant's compliance with Title VII had not been accomplished by conciliation and that they had the right to sue in the appropriate Federal District Court within 30 days after receiving said suit letter.

(b) On or about May 25, 1968, within 90 days of being discriminated against, named plaintiffs LONG, PINKARD, and McELROY, among others, filed a written complaint, under oath, with the Commission alleging denial by all of the defendant unions, locals, and Company of their rights under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C., §2000e et seq. On or about July 29, 1968, after the Commission had been in possession of the written complaint for over sixty days, the named plaintiffs notified said Commission of their desire to receive a suit letter prior to 30 days from July 13, 1968, so as to avoid a multiplicity of law suits. On or about July 31, 1968, said Commission sent a letter authorizing suit within 30 days to each of the named plaintiffs.

(c) Neither the State of Georgia, the State of Alabama, nor the City of Rome, Georgia, has a law prohibiting the unlawful employment practices complained of herein.

XXII.

Plaintiffs and their class have no plain, adequate, or complete remedy at law to redress the wrongs alleged herein, and this suit for a preliminary and permanent injunction is their only means of securing adequate relief. Plaintiffs and the class they represent are now suffering and will continue to suffer irreparable injury from all the defendants' policies, practices, customs, and usages as set forth herein.

WHEREFORE, plaintiffs pray that this Court advance the case on the docket, order a speedy hearing at the earliest practicable date, cause this case to be in every way expedited, and upon such hearing to:

1. Declare that the acts or failures to act complained of in paragraphs XV through XIX, supra, are unlawful;

2. Grant to the plaintiffs and their class a preliminary and permanent injunction enjoining defendants, their agents, successors, employees, attorneys, and those in active concert and participation with them from:

a. Requiring that Negro employees seeking promotion or transfer and/or applicants for employment to pass a test or tests, except insofar as any such test or tests have both been validated for a particular job through a professionally supervised study and been approved by the Court as complying with §703(a) and (h) of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. §2000e-(a), (h);

b. Requiring that Negro employees seeking transfer or promotion to jobs formerly reserved for white employees pass any test which any present white holders of such jobs were not required to pass, or any test that was not required of them because of their race or color at the time of employment;

c. Utilizing a promotion system that takes into account only service on a particular job, and more particularly, from failing or refusing to adopt a nondiscriminatory promotion system based on total years of plant service;

d. Maintaining segregated locker room facilities;

e. Maintaining the Craftsman's Club on a segregated basis;

f. Refusing to allow Negro employees to hold any positions wherein they supervise white employees;

g. Maintaining separate lines of progression, on the basis of race, within departments of the plant;

h. Maintaining union membership in locals on the basis of race or color;

i. Entering into any contract or contracts which discriminate against any class or group of employees on the basis of their race or color;

j. Continuing or maintaining any other policy, practice, custom, or usage which is intended to or has the effect of denying, abridging, withholding, conditioning, limiting, or otherwise interfering because of their race or color, with the full rights of plaintiffs and their class to enjoy equal employment opportunities;

k. Failing to represent, timely notify, or properly grieve on behalf of any individual or group on the basis of race or class; and,

3. Award to each of the named plaintiffs back pay equivalent to the difference between the wages they have earned in their present jobs from the time that they were first discriminated against in their attempts to advance to formerly all white jobs and the wages that they would have earned in said white jobs, from the time of the discrimination against them until the resolution of this suit;

4. Award to the named plaintiffs herein their costs, including a reasonable attorney's fees as provided for in §703(k) of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. §2000e-5(k);

5. Grant any such other relief as is meet and proper under the circumstances.

Dear Mr. Whiting:

In response to my request last week, my regional staff members have sent me information on the Georgia Kraft Corporation. Some of the material is not completely clear. Some joint ownership of plants is involved, apparently a not uncommon phenomenon, but it raises questions about which home office is really responsible for policy.

Georgia Kraft Corporation is jointly owned, 50% by Inland Container Corporation (120 East Market Street, Indianapolis, Indiana) and 50% by Mead Corporation (118 First Street, Dayton, Ohio). Some information about these corporations is enclosed.

Mead Corporation was one of 15 firms which participated in a tour of predominatly Negro colleges. William J. Ahlfield, Director of Public Relations for Mead, has said that his company "hopes to recruit more Negro graduates to fill growing technical manpower needs."

Mead is a Plans for Progress company while Inland Container is not. Therefore, it might be reasonable to expect that the decision to upgrade Negro employees came from the Mead side of the company. However, note that Inland Container has a vice-president in charge of manpower and development, which would indicate that the company has concerns in this area.

Georgia Kraft has two large plants. The mill in Macon (Bibb County) has a pulp capacity of 825 tons per day. Apparently, it has had no major expansions in the past two years and has announced no plans. The other mills in Bibb County are planning extensive expansions. Armstrong Cork Company, whose mill in Bibb County has a daily pulp capacity of 400 tons, announced in 1966 that it was making one of the largest expansions in its history. The expansion of its fiberboard mill in Macon will increase production 50%. Late in 1967 Packaging Corporation of America's plant for manufacturing molded pulp products went into production. Earlier this year, it was announced that there would be a $2.2 million expansion of the plant. The expansion will be financed by a revenue bond issue of the Macon-Bibb County Industrial Authority and is to be completed in 1969. I mention developments in these other mills because factors affecting Georgia Kraft's competitive situation may have some impact on the firm's decision to upgrade its workers. Bibb County's population was 141,249 in 1960 of which 33.4% were Negroes. About 27.8% of the families have incomes less than $3000. Population increased 23.8% between 1950-1960.

Georgia Kraft has a mill in Rome (Floyd County) which has a pulp capacity of 1500 tons per day. In the fall of 1967 it constructed a research and development unit adjacent to its headquarters and mill. No new expansions have been announced. The population of Floyd County in 1960 was 69,130 of which 14.3% were Negroes. About 28.5% of the families in the County have incomes less than $3000 annually.

Brunswick Pulp and Paper Company which is an affiliate of both the Mead Corporation and Scott Paper Company has a mill in Glynn County which produces 1120 tons of pulp per day. An editorial in the industry journal Pulp and Paper shortly after the assassination of Martin Luther King referred to Brunswick, Georgia as a "model example of how race problems can be solved" and mentioned that the paper industry had played an important role in this. However, no details were given.

Alabama Kraft is a division of Georgia Kraft. It has an 800 ton per day mill in Cottonton, Alabama, about 30 miles south of Phenix City. We also have the following information about a mill located in Mahrt, Alabama, but I believe it is the same facility as the one identified at Cottonton.

> Mahrt, Alabama. Early in 1967 Alabama Kraft Company began operation of its high speed containerboard machines. The capacity of the new mill is 800 tons per day of unbleached containerboard. It contains a number of innovations, making it one of the more modern mills in the pulp and paper industry. The cost of the mill was $45 million.

Our committee in Phenix City has had difficulty in getting black employees upgraded at this plant. My staff member reports that the company's image in the surrounding community is not good. He also reported that Alabama Kraft had a strike from March to May. Results were negligible.

Mead has a 540 ton per day mill in Chillicothe, Ohio, an 180 ton pulp mill in Harriman, Tennessee, a 260 ton mill in Kingsport and an 180 ton mill in Lynchburg, Virginia. In March 1967 Mead expressed an interest in establishing a facility in Calhoun Falls, South Carolina. At the same time, it announced a $2.5 million expansion program at its plant in Sylvia, South Carolina.

I have just learned that Legal Defense Fund attorneys filed suit on August 9 against the Georgia Kraft Company and the labor unions in its Rome, Georgia facility. A copy of the complaint is enclosed. Our Georgia and New York attorneys are now consulting together about the suit. The complaint will probably be amended but the basic issue of discrimination which the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission verified and was unable to resolve seems clear. Georgia Kraft practices discrimination in its hiring, assigning and upgrading of employees, participates with unions in a discriminatory seniority system and has a testing program which has effectively barred Negroes from entry level as well as advanced positions. Apparently, some facilities in the plant are segregated.

The investigations by Federal enforcement officials and the threat of legal action have undoubtedly contributed to the firm's decision to launch the program to train 100 Negro workers who are considered to be difficult to upgrade. To be effective the program in which you are interested must be part of a total approach to the problem of completely reorganizing the employment structure in the Georgia plants.

Elsewhere in the South the combination of pressure from Federal agencies and legal action by private parties is resulting in agreements which offer promise that employment patterns in pulp and paper plants can be changed. There are now precedents which Georgia Kraft can follow if management sincerely wishes to offer equal employment opportunity to black workers. However, if the firm is embarking upon a token training project as a substitute for a genuine effort to eliminate all vestiges of discrimination, then this should be exposed as such.

We will be glad to keep in touch with you as legal action proceeds. Meanwhile, we would be interested in knowing what you can tell us about the arrangement which Georgia Kraft has worked out with MIND for this training project.

Sincerely,

JF/11

Dear Miss Fairfax:

Many, many thanks for the information you sent to me in response to my questions about Georgia Kraft Corporation. I am sure it will prove very useful as we decide whether to continue with this potential grant.

Georgia Kraft's arrangement with MIND is an indirect one. It is my understanding that Georgia Kraft's interest in this upgrading program was piqued by William Haddad's U.S. Research & Development Corporation (Tower Suite 6100, Chrysler Building, New York, Phone-682-0284), which was running an employment program in Laurens, South Carolina. In a trial move Georgia Kraft sent four employees at full company expense to Laurens to take part in a basic education and counseling/motivational program. The results with these four men were so impressive in terms of reading and mathematical scores and in terms of job attitudes, that the company worked out an agreement with U.S. R & D to train 135 Negro employees who now cannot pass the company's test and enter lines of progression. The total cost per trainee for the U.S. R & D program is around $1200. The company will pay $200 of this plus provide facilities for the training. The training would take place before or after the work shifts (and on the employee's own time). Georgia Kraft "guarantees" to upgrade every man who completes this program and meets the (I understand) more reasonable requirements of their newly validated testing program.

U.S. R & D has for some time used the MIND system for its basic education instruction. I understand, however, that they are developing their own such system and will eventually phase out of the MIND program.

I hope that this answers your questions. If not, please call me at any time. Once again, thank you for your assistance.

Sincerely yours

Dear Emory:

Enclosed is a copy of Jean Fairfax's letter to me and the complaint filed by the NAACP Legal Defense Fund against Georgia Kraft. Also enclosed is a copy of my letter responding to hers.

I am very glad you will be able to check into this situation for us during the last week of August. The mere fact of this suit does not predispose us one way or the other regarding the proposed grant, but we do have to check into the situation much more closely since this suit raises serious allegations. Georgia Kraft may, of course, have contrived this upgrading program as a tactic in their legal battles. Assuming that the program itself is good, there is nothing wrong with their doing that as long as proper attitudes and intentions exist and progress is possible on the other matters raised in the suit, (if true).

My visit to Georgia Kraft was all too brief, but the officers certainly did not strike me as red-necks and the program looks good. I further understand that during my visit Georgia Kraft was in the process of negotiating new contracts with the pertinent unions and was seeking a change from job to plant seniority for the negroes who would be moved by this training program out of the labor pool and the wood lot into lines of progression. I further understand that Georgia Kraft's tests have all been completely revalidated and the cut-off scores reduced substantially (but I do not know the details on this). If all this is true, then it seems to me that the worst of the allegations in the suit (discriminatory testing and seniority systems), are being adequately dealt with.

Beyond these matters, it would certainly be helpful to know a bit more of the background of the suit and, in particular, why conciliation failed. The story on segregated locker room and recreational facilities ought to be easy to come by. The other areas of concern (segregated lines of progression, union discriminatory practices, a lack of negroes in supervisory positions, and the creation of new jobs for whites in the wood lot) are clear in the complaint.

We will certainly appreciate any information you can provide on these matters. Some time ago I mentioned to Robert Rock at Georgia Kraft that you or a colleague might stop by. I'll be happy to further pave the way with a direct phone call if you think that would be helpful.

Many thanks for your help.

Sincerely yours,

Baze

AMERICAN PAPER INSTITUTE
PROPOSED ACTIVITIES IN CONNECTION WITH
U. S. RESEARCH & DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION PILOT PROGRAM TO UPGRADE EMPLOYEES OF PULP, PAPER & PAPERBOARD INDUSTRIES

MONITORING

The API will maintain close contact with representatives of U. S. Research & Development Corporation and the Industrial Relations and Personnel officials of the company to be used for the pilot program. The API will arrange for periodic progress reports from the Program Director showing achievements to date and will forward these to the Ford Foundation. After employees have completed the program, API will arrange for the employing companies to keep track of their progress in the various lines of progression and to follow up on their job performance at regular intervals over a period of two years.

EVALUATING

The API will engage industry training expert, Dr. Joseph M. Rich, Manager, Personnel Resources, St. Regis Paper Company, and Dr. Herbert R. Northrop, Chairman, Department of Industry, Wharton School of Finance and Commerce, University of Pennsylvania, or an acceptable training and manpower expert to evaluate the success of the program. These men will make periodic reviews of the training as it progresses and furnish written reports to the API of their respective views on the program's values and accomplishments.

PUBLICIZING

As soon as the program begins, API will announce it to industry members through its Semimonthly Labor Report. The API will send to the trade, business and general press, press releases approved by the pilot company, U. S. Research & Development Corporation, and by the Ford Foundation. As the program progresses, additional press releases will be issued to the same media. Upon completion of the program roundup stories, detailing its achievements will be issued to all media with efforts being made to have these featured in general business as well as trade and professional publications.

Steps will be taken to interest the American Management Association, American Society for Training and Development, American Society of Trade Association Executives, National Association of Manufacturers, U. S. Chamber of Commerce and other trade organizations to advise their members of this program and its success.

A representative of the U. S. Research & Development Corporation is scheduled to describe the project at a meeting of 100 Industrial Relations and Personnel officials of the Southern Paper Industry in Atlanta, Georgia, early in October, 1968. A similar presentation will be made in March, 1969 at the 9th API-FBA Personnel Relations Conference, to be attended by over 250 top Personnel, Industrial Relations and Training Officials of Pulp, Paper and Paperboard companies from the entire United States. Talks on the program, its progress and success will be made by API staff members at various membership and division meetings held during the next twelve months.

RE: Further Information on Pulp and Paper Companies

The following information concerning Scott Paper Company came in an article in the August 12, 1968 issue of "Paper Trade Journal:

> Scott Paper Co. has initiated an equal employment action program designed to help eleviate the job-finding and job-advancement problems of minority groups in the Chester, Pa. area
> It is expected to cost more than $100,000 in Scott and federal funds. The plan was revealed by Robert L. Thomson, Chester plant personnel manager, who said it involves three basic educational and training programs to be conducted at the company's Chester complex.
> In making the announcement Mr. Thomson pointed out that in addition to the $100,000 funded program, Scott also will absorb the man-hour costs in salaries paid to those employees who will be trained on company time. He estimated this additional cost at approximately $25,000.
> Scott will hire and provide special training for 30 disadvantanged persons for whom job entry qualifications will be waived. This program is under the auspices of the National Alliance of Businessmen, a partnership of industry and government aimed at finding permanent jobs for the hard-core unemployed, as well as summer employment for high school youth.
> The 30 employees will receive a nine-week on-the-job training program which will be conducted on company time by the nationally recognized Board for Fundamental Education. It is scheduled to begin on October 1, Mr. Thomson said.
> Another program will provide 150 hours each of fundamental education for 100 current Scott employees. Conducted at no cost to the employees and on their free time, it will be voluntary and designed to upgrade their educational level so they can improve job skill and advancement opportunities within the plant.
> In a third program, according to Mr. Thomson, 250 plant supervisor and union leaders will each receive 16 hours of training in specialized skills and leadership techniques so they will better understand and work more effectively with culturally disadvantaged employees.

Scott Paper Company has a pulp and paper mill in Mobile, Alabama. It, together with the Mead Corporation, owns Brunswick Pulp and Paper Company, which has a mill in Brunswick, Georgia.

It may be of some importance to note the fact that William Mizer, president of Hudson Pulp and Paper Company, which has a mill in Palatka, Florida, is a part of a group of businessmen who have come out in support of Senator Eugene McCarthy for President. The following company officials have come out for Nixon: G. Keith Funston, Chairman of Olin Mathieson Chemical Corporation; Robert V. Hansberger, President of Boise Cascade; and David L. Luke III, President of West Virginia Pulp and Paper Company.

TO: ALL KRAFTSMEN

FROM: DOYLE F. DYKES

As most of you know, the Krannert Division of Georgia Kraft Company is at present a party to a federal court lawsuit involving the interpretation of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. The International Brotherhood of Pulp, Sulphite and Papermill Workers AFL-CIO and it's locals 804 and 805, and the United Papermakers and Paperworkers AFL-CIO and it's local #654 have also been named as parties to the suit brought by three individual employees.

The parts of the law being questioned in this suit pertains to employee testing, seniority and to certain other matters.

This Company is fully committed to equal opportunity and treatment for all its employees and applicants for employment. Our present procedures for testing both employees and applicants for employment as well as our seniority policies are tailored to meet the needs of our operations and are applied in what we believe to be a completely non-discriminating fashion.

We have no resentment toward the employees who brought this suit. We do not, however, agree with some interpretations being made of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. The suit, therefore, is serving a constructive purpose; namely, determining through the courts the legal interpretation and how to apply the sections of the Act involved.

Along with these employees, we share a mutual respect in the integrity of our courts to interpret the law and we expect to abide by the interpretation as ruled upon by these courts.

It is impossible to predict when the court will render its ruling or what that ruling will be; therefore, Georgia Kraft Company will continue to be guided by its policy of May 15, 1963, in which is stated:

> "It is the policy of Georgia Kraft Company not to discriminate against any employee or applicant for employment because of race, color, creed or national origin."

I will try to keep you informed on any major developments on this subject.

As previously reported in this newspaper, a suit has been filed charging Georgia Kraft Company with violation of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

In an exclusive interview with this newspaper today, Doyle F. Dykes, Krannert Division Manager for Georgia Kraft Company, stated that "the Krannert Division of the Company, two international unions and three local unions have been named by three individual employees as parties to a federal court lawsuit involving interpretation of the 1964 Civil Rights Act."

According to Dykes, the interpretation being questioned in this suit pertains to employee testing, seniority and to certain other matters.

Stating the Company's position, Mr. Dykes continued: "This Company is fully committed to equal opportunity and treatment for all its employees and applicants for employment. Our present procedures for testing both employees and applicants for employment as well as our seniority policies are tailored to meet the needs of our operations and are applied in what we believe to be a completely non-discriminating fashion.

Dear Mr. Rock:

This is a belated message to thank you for your time and the information which you supplied me when we met in your office on September 11.

Mr. Whiting's schedule was such that there was some delay in his getting my report, but he now has it. I trust all goes well.

Look forward to seeing you again.

Merit found in different approaches to jobless crisis

The extent to which many companies in this industry already have succeeded in turning hard core unemployed Negroes into future taxpayers instead of dependents on your tax dollars is little known. I thought I had done "my homework" on this subject but must confess the result of an informal survey I made of 20 leading companies is amazing. Some are carrying on really meaningful programs of education and training without one penny of federal money and in other cases there has been partial government assistance and money from Ford Foundation and other private donors.

Our supervisors and foremen and union leaders must realize this is a brand new ball game. Companies can't do the job without the understanding and the willingness of their supervisors, as well as the unions, to tackle the problem. Companies must give special training to supervisors, on company time, to pass on instruction and counsel to the disadvantaged and unemployed. To protest that this is costly and lowers productiveness by diverting these men from their jobs is nonsense. How do employees become supervisors without training and guidance? Besides, government subsidies are available. The Department of Labor allotted $135,000 recently to three paper mills for training programs. The hard core jobless will receive pre-vocational training (attitudinal, motivational, remedial basic education) as well as on-the-job training and counseling. Of course it's not going to be easy. Some jobless don't even own an alarm clock; never had to be anywhere on time. To date, one paper company has pledged 80 needy youth jobs and 83 basic jobs to blacks in four mills and its R&D division. But to make room for them, present employees need help and the opportunity to move up. In a big eastern paper mill, a $30,000 program aims at upgrading the literacy level of 100 white and non-white employees. Says Earl Sayers, Plymouth, N.C., superindendent: "Don't think southerners who don't go far in school aren't smart. Many learn faster than others; they are anxious to make up for what they missed."

One of the most heartening results of the tragic violence and destruction publicized in the press and on the air is the reaction of many individual mill workers. They want to become involved—to do something on their own for minorities in their paper mill towns. Not only in the mills, but through their churches, clubs and schools. This emergence of outspoken and personal awareness and desire to help doesn't make the headlines. But it will go far to offset destructive reactions of "militant" blacks and whites. Not least of all, it means a more stable business climate in scores of mill towns.

In all fairness to this industry, it should be recognized that two different approaches can be taken to promote employment and advancement of blacks. At least three large paper companies have received orders from the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to eliminate all job standards and change from departmental to plant seniority. But that isn't necessarily the best approach. Georgia Kraft Co. has taken a different one. Through the U.S. Research and Development Corp. in Atlanta, a private organization, it is educating Negroes so they can pass present job standards and advance in the mills. Already, four Negroes have attended a six weeks' course in this school in Atlanta and similar instruction is being provided in mill headquarters in Rome, Ga. The Ford Foundation thinks well enough of this approach to give $150,000 to William Haddad, chairman of chief executive of USR&D Corp., to promote it. Clifford L. Alexander, EEOC chairman, should give it a fair trial in the pulp and paper industry, as an alternative to his order, under which the underprivileged might fail anyway. This pre-job training might prevent failures. (More next week.) □

HOWARD R. DRESSNER
SECRETARY

November 15, 1968

Dear Beth:

Mike Sviridoff and I will be at your office at 9:30 a.m., Monday, November 18. The background and purpose of our meeting are as follows:

Section 501(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 exempts from Federal income tax organizations described in Section 501(c)(3), namely, organizations

> "....organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, testing for public safety, literary, or educational purposes..., no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private shareholder or individual...."

To the present, the Foundation's policy has been to limit its grants, in the case of domestic organizations, to organizations with Treasury exemption letters. Since an organization which has such a letter is presumably organized and operated for exempt purposes, this policy has acted as a safeguard that the grant would be used only for such purposes.

It should be noted that our practice to date has been the Foundation's own policy decision. Neither the Internal Revenue Code nor the Foundation's Articles of Incorporation require that grants be made only to organizations which have received Treasury exemption letters. Thus, so far as we can determine and according to an earlier opinion of counsel (see attached), the Foundation is not prohibited by law from making a grant to a non-501(c)(3) organization provided it is made for 501(c)(3) purposes. The point is underscored by a recent Revenue Ruling (68-489) which holds that > grants for "501(c)(3) purposes" to organizations which do not have Treasury rulings indicating they are tax-exempt under 501(c)(3) will not jeopardize the grantor's exemption provided the grantor "maintains control and discretion as to the use of the funds" together with appropriate records.

The question is whether, in the light of this new Revenue Ruling (attached), the Foundation's Trustees should approve a change in policy which will permit the Foundation to make grants to non-501(c)(3) organizations for 501(c)(3) purposes.

A case in point is a proposed grant of $141,000 to the American Paper Institute for a demonstration training program to upgrade employees of a Southern paper mill. (The recommended action is appended as Attachment A.) Though the American Paper Institute is not a 501(c)(3) organization, there is little doubt that the purpose for which the proposed grant is intended is a 501(c)(3) purpose.

Were the Trustees to approve such a change in policy, it would be the Foundation's practice to have counsel review proposed grants to non-501(c)(3) organizations in cases where there was a serious doubt as to whether the grant purpose was a "501(c)(3) purpose."

Mike and I would like to discuss the pro's and con's of a policy change in this regard and to have the benefit of your views and counsel.

Sincerely,

Mr. Bethuel M. Webster

The Honorable Charles E. Wyzanski, Jr.

Dear Charlie:

I am sending you some papers which Max Kempner and I have just discussed with Mike Sviridoff and Howard Dressner.

The proposed grant to the American Paper Institute, a 501(c)(6) organization, was discussed at the recent Executive Committee meeting which you were unable to attend. According to Howard, Mac Bundy and John Cowles felt that, although the purpose of the grant--"A demonstration training program to upgrade employees of a Southern paper mill"-- is consistent with our charter and with a decision taken by the Board at its September 1967 meeting, a departure from the policy of making grants only to 501(c)(3) organizations should be discussed with you and me.

I said that I felt that the proposal should be considered at the December meeting--this on the basis of an expanded description of the program, supported by an agreement in writing with the Paper Institute, a letter of recommendation from Emory Via of the Southern Regional Council, a detailed description of the role of United States Research and Development Corporation, etc. Howard will send copies of the expanded description to all Trustees before the December meeting.

My own feeling is that, for the present, any non-501(c)(3) grants should be reviewed by counsel, and in case of serious doubt be submitted to the Board or Executive Committee. The Foundation must of course, as the enclosed ruling indicates, retain sufficient control and discretion as to the use of funds to be satisfied that the grant is used for 501(c)(3) purposes.

SUBJECT: Meeting with Beth Webster re: grants to non-501(c)(3) organizations

Mike Sviridoff and I met with Beth Webster yesterday regarding a possible change in Foundation policy that would permit our making grants to non-501(c)(3) organizations.

The particular case in point was the proposed grant to the American Paper Institute, a 501(c)(6) organization.

We discussed the pro's and con's of changing the present policy. Beth agreed that there was no legal bar to our making grants to non-501(c)(3)'s for "501(c)(3) purposes." Further, he expressed the view that cases might arise from time to time in which there were cogent reasons for making grants to non-501(c)(3)'s; at the same time, he felt we should not make such grants as a general practice but only as rare exceptions to the general rule.

He regarded the American Paper Institute proposal as one which probably justified our making an exception but asked that the write-up be strengthened to show why an exception was warranted and the special steps that would be taken to monitor the grant closely. He suggested that Mike ask the American Paper Institute for a letter agreeing specifically to the plan and to its obligations under the plan.

Beth agreed that it would be desirable to submit the proposal to the Board in December so that the 501(c)(3) policy might be thoroughly discussed and the reasons for an occasional exception thoroughly understood.

Finally, Beth indicated he would write to Judge Wyzanski setting forth the problem and his own views on how to deal with it.

American Paper Institute Grant

So that we won't be caught unprepared, we ought to double-check the points Beth Webster and others raised on this grant and see if we have them adequately covered:

1. Mr. Webster asked (in his letter of Nov. 18) for:

   a. "...an expanded description of the program...." This is in your hands.

   b. "...supported by an agreement in writing with the Paper Institute...."

   We have a signed letter with a detailed attachment on API's role. Is that an adequate "agreement" ? Or do we need something more formal ?

   c. "...a letter of recommendation from Emory Via of the Southern Regional Council...." This is forthcoming, though it will be a report with conclusions, not recommendations.

   d. "...a detailed description of the role of United States Research and Development Corporation...." We have a detailed proposal and budget from them which covers this. (They are profit-making, by the way, and part of the fee they will charge API will go for profit), though they are doing this cheaper than normal and under incentive payment factors which could backfire and hurt them).

2. Mr. Trimble's memo discusses "....appropriate procedures....to insure that any grant....is in fact devoted to exempt purposes...." He suggest the following:

   a. "The Foundation should specify clearly and in detail the purposes for which the granted funds are to be used..." We have the detailed proposals from API and U.S. R&D and they will be incorporated into the grant letter by reference. In light of the tax situation, do we need to go beyond this by including more explicit treatment in the grant letter... or by some more formal "agreement" than the detailed proposals and correspondence ?

c. ".....the right to monitor the use of the granted funds....." Emory Via has agreed to do this for us; and while we don't have anything in writing which says API will let us monitor them, I can't conceive of their not doing so. I'm sure they will cooperate fully. We can mention this in the grant letter.

3. It might be useful, both from our standpoint and to help our monitor, Dr. Via, to have a statement from our lawyers of some of the things API, as a Business League exempted under 501 (c) (6), should not do in connection with this grant. What are the borderline areas where we might get into trouble? (They exist to improve the image of the industry, while one of the purposes of this grant is to publicize the results of the demonstration-- we've included $ 4,000 for evaluation and printing. Are there areas of potential conflict here?)

4. We don't have a letter from Mr. Rock at Georgia Kraft guaranteeing that these trainees will be promoted-- that would be hard to do anyway. Their normal promotional procedures (stated in union contracts in our possession) should take care of that. Beyond that, I think we have to rely on the good faith and common sense of the Company not to pull any hanky=panky when this program places them in the spotlight.

Mr. Basil Whiting
The Ford Foundation

New York, New York

Dear Basil:

This letter will summarize my response to my visit with Mr. Robert Rock, Vice President of Georgia Kraft and several other persons in Rome and Atlanta regarding the proposal for upgrading under-employed workers.

It seems to me that there are two questions on which my comments might prove helpful. One relates to my judgment of the Company's good faith and the other has to do with whether the proposed training will interfere with the pending court case. Briefly, I think that the company is acting in sufficient good faith to justify the project, and that the project should not in anyway interfere with the court case.

I talked at length with Mr. Rock and was pointed in my questions and comments, although careful to separate what was germane to the proposed project from my private observations. There is little doubt in my mind that the company could have been further along in the process of desegregating jobs including making use of current employees. Some of these employees need only a moderate amount, if any, training to qualify for better jobs than they now hold. However, the company and union have responded in part to current pressures on them and have modified the seniority system, changed the admissions rules to the employees' club, and desegregated locker rooms. They are also subjecting their testing procedures to re-examination. Personally, I think that the court will require more of them in seniority revisions than they have made, but once required, I would anticipate little resistance. Also, I do not feel that their consulting psychologist is likely to make extensive changes in testing procedures until after the court has begun to act. But, again, I think the company will respond affirmatively to what is required.

Although the company is a little guarded in saying what it will do because of the court case, they seem to clearly understand that they will have to make fairly extensive changes in their practices and that the training program will be of significant help to them in making them. This is sufficient as a practical motivation to insure good faith, I think. And I believe their good intentions go beyond this.

The company, at the time of my visit, felt that some of the issues (testing and seniority) should be left to the court to adjudicate and would wait for those actions before making significant new moves except as the training program itself produced results. I do believe that the company is now prepared to act on these results whether or not the court has ruled. Leaders in the Negro local union, though critical of the slow pace of change to date, felt the company would respond positively to a court ruling.

The Atlanta attorney retained by the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc. has agreed with me (before and after my visit to Rome) that the training program will not hurt the suit. Basically, the court will be interested in results. At present the company's court pleadings can only use the proposal to indicate intentions. If the training also leads to results so much the better. I recognize that some of the results could be achieved without the training, but for large numbers of the Negro employees the training will be instrumental in making them capable of full integration in the work force. For all of them, I think, the training will prove to be an asset on the job (even if not essential) and in the union and community.

Please let me know if I can be of further assistance in this matter.

Sincerely,

Emory F. Via, Director

THE AMERICAN PAPER INSTITUTE

Recommended Action: Approval of a grant of $141,000 to the American Paper Institute for a demonstration training program to upgrade low level (mostly Negro) employees of a Southern paper mill.

Budget: Appropriation No. 576: $1.7 million for a demonstration series of industrial job training programs, approved by the Trustees on Dec. 7-8, 1967
Balance: $665,500

Background: Most of the nation's $2.2 billion manpower efforts are concentrated upon the unemployed or on those preparing to enter the labor force. Relatively little attention has yet been paid to the problems of the sub-employed-- particularly those millions of workers employed full time in low-paying, low status jobs. Many of these workers are loyal and responsible employees with long years of service in sizeable private firms; but because of their inability to meet business and industrial educational standards -- or because of the absence of adequate training and promotion policies in much of the private sector--such workers are locked into entry level or near entry level positions. In the South, low-level workers are often Negro; and their problems are compounded by especially poor educational backgrounds and by deeply ingrained discriminatory practices on the part of both employers and, where they exist, unions.

The Southern paper industry, for instance, is fully unionized and pays relatively high wages, yet Negro employment in paper mills has traditionally been limited to low and semi-skilled positions, generally in wood gathering and wood-lot operations. While these activities do provide some opportunities for promotion, they are relatively few in number and offer lower pay increments than the higher skilled,in-plant lines of progression. Further, the unions and the sanitary and recreational facilities of these laborers are generally segregated from those of the white machinists, electricians, plumbers, and papermakers.

This pattern of segregation was once often enforced by explicitly racist company and union policies; now it exists through custom and through hiring, promotional, and membership practices which often less intentionally discriminatory. Such de facto job discrimination, however, is beginning to break down in this and many other Southern industries under the impact of three developments: First, the rapid urbanization and industrialization of the South, which has created labor shortages; second, the slow emergence of a new "Southern mentality" among some public officials and business leaders, who recognize that continued progress requires the full utilization of all of the South's human resources; and third, and most important, the pressures applied by the Federal Government through the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission (EEOC) and the Office of Federal Contract Compliance (OFCC). The second and particularly the third of these developments have been more important stimulants of change in the paper industry than the first, since the relatively high wage structure and strong unions of this industry enable it to attract the workers it needs.

Throughout the South, evidence of physical segregation in paper plants is fast disappearing. At the same time, testing procedures and seniority systems which served to prevent Negroes from entering skilled lines of progression are falling before Court action or changing "voluntarily" in the face of possible loss of Federal contracts. These are welcome developments, but they merely remove or reduce inappropriate barriers to Negro advancement. Without training and remedial education, it is doubtful that many poorly educated, untrained Negro laborers will be able to take advantage of their new opportunities.

The experience of the Georgia Kraft Company has not been atypical. Kraft produces paper for corrugated cardboard containers in three plants (two in Georgia, one in Alabama). The two Georgia plants produce 2350 tons of pulp per day and employ 1375 workers. The Company's community reputation seems good and its labor relations excellent (it has never had a strike). Approximately 10 percent of Kraft's employees are Negroes locked into entry or near entry level jobs. With the exception of perhaps 20 foremen and "Chipperfeeders" (those who feed logs into chipping machines), all earn between $2.43 and $2.90 per hour and belong to a union. They have worked for the Company an average of 10 years and range in age from 20 to 50, in education from none to high school graduate.

The familiar pattern of discrimination and segregation was presented in a complaint filed before the EEOC in 1966 by three Negro "Kraftsmen". That complaint charged the Company and union locals with allowing segregated locker rooms, lines of progression and recreational facilities, utilizing unvalidated and inappropriate tests for promotion, and maintaining a discriminatory seniority system. The response of Company and unions has been slow but steady and not unwilling change. The locker rooms have been desegregated; the "Kraftsmen's Club" has voluntarily admitted its first three Negroes; most lines of progression enjoy at least token integration; tests have been revalidated and passing scores lowered; and the segregated unions seem likely to merge.

Nonetheless, Kraft's Division Manager, Doyle F. Dykes, and Industrial Relations Director, Robert A. Rock, observed that few of the Negro work force were able to complete successfully even the modified testing program. As a result, the Company filled its vacancies (numbering 82 in 1967) in more lucrative lines of progression by hiring new, generally white, and better educated workers.

Rock had heard of the successful anti-pverty training activities of the United States Research and Developme nt Corporation (US R & D) in Laurens, South Carolina; and he arranged an experimental pilot program (at full Company expense) to determine if such training would enable Kraft's entry-level employees to qualify for promotion. (US R&D) is a private, profit-making firm specializing in basic education and motivational training. It is based in New York City and headed by William F. Haddad, a member of the New York City School Board). Four entry level employees who had failed the Company's tests underwent ten weeks of training at U.S. R&D's Columbus, Georgia, center. Subsequently they passed the promotional tests and displayed markedly improved attitudes and initiative. This experience and further negotiations with U.S. R&D convinced Dykes and Rock that such a training program would enable them to upgrade almost all of their low-level work force within approximately two years (at normal rates of attrition in the higher lines of progression). This would increase the productivity of the Company's work force, open entry level jobs for the currently unemployed, and rid the Company of an embarrassing situation of de facto segregation. Further, since almost all Southern paper mills have similar concentrations of semi-literate Negroes in their woodyards, such an effort would serve as a model to other companies.

U. S. R&D's eighteen week training program would cost, however, approximately $1000 per man (excluding utilities and space), a sum not overly inconsistent with costs of similar programs but one a competitive company has difficulty absorbing in its budget, especially since such training is a departure from normal business practice. Nonetheless, Dykes and Rock pursuaded their Officers to authorize a program and to contribute approximately $275 per man plus space and utilities to its cost. Rock and U.S. R&D then approached the Foundation in February 1968 and requested our support for the remainder.

Staff was interested in such a demonstration from two standpoints: First, upgrading and industrial training practices are areas being explored by the Foundation as likely major issues in national manpower policy in the near future. There are now no Federal programs for upgrading, but a successful demonstration of this nature could well influence the future course of Federal policy. Second, it is important to show Negroes as well as whites (especially in the South) that the black men can advance above menial, entry-level jobs. We were concerned, however, that the proposed demonstration should not be isolated but should have an industry-wide impact. In response to these concerns, Georgia Kraft and U. S. R&D engaged the interest of the American Paper Institute (API), the industry's trade organization whose membership includes most major pulp, paper, and paperboard manufacturers in the United State. API enthusiastically agreed to act as sponsor, monitor, and evaluator of the project and to publicize its results.

2 yrs for evaluation

Nature of Proposal: A three year grant of $141,000 to the American Paper Institute (API) for a demonstration training program to upgrade low level (and mostly Negro) employees in the Rome and Macon plants of the Georgia Kraft Company. The training will be offered to the entire 135 man low level work force of these plants, and all who complete the program successfully will be offered positions in lines of progression previously closed to them because of their own inadequate education and motiviation or because of discriminatory practices by Company or unions. The program will be evaluated by API and publicized throughout the paper industry, particularly in the South, as a model of filling vacancies by in-house escalation and as a means of affording more equal employment opportunities to Negroes.

API will arrange for U. S. R&D to provide training in basic literacy and mathematics, basic physics, and test orientation as well as intensive motivational and counseling services, all in accordance with U. S. R& D's detailed proposal, a copy of which is on file in the office of Social Development. Classes will be two hours in duration, held three times per week on the employee's own time immediately before or after his work shift. Employees with less than a 3.5 grade level reading ability will be allowed to go through both of the planned 18 week cycles, but others may be able to pass the Company's tests after only a few weeks of brush-up training. As each employee passes the tests, he will be eligible to transfer to any line of progression in the mills on the basis of mill seniority, which favors these employees. The Company has further agreed to maintain the hourly rates of those individuals earning less than $3.00 per hour who transfer into a line of progression position normally paying a lower rate. Jobs in the lines of progression range in pay from $2.56 per hour at the bottom up to $4.56 per hour; further progression by the trainees up the ladder to the higher paying jobs will be based upon demonstrated ability and job seniority.

API has engaged the services of paper industry training expert Dr. Joseph M. Rich, Manager, Personnel Resources, St. Regis Paper Company, and of Foundation grantee, Dr. Herbert R. Northrup, Chairman, Department of Industry, Wharton School of Finance and Commerce, University of Pennsylvania, to evaluate and report on the program for two years beyond the completion of training. In addition, API will thoroughly publicize the program and its results, concentrating on the paper industry via API's publications and through paper industry conferences, but also informing the general public, other industries, and such general industrial organizations as the U. S. Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers.

Both API and Georgia Kraft feel that a successful demonstration of the advantages of such training will lead other companies in the industry to sponsor and support fully such programs in the future. To further this process, API will try to arrange for observers, or if feasible, trainees from other paper companies to participate in the program.

Discussion: This is a modest grant in both size and purpose, but three aspects of it deserve attention:

1. Funds are being requested from Appropriation 576, approved almost a year ago for demonstration training programs within industry. At the time the Appropriation was requested, staff had intended to utilize the funds for training the hard-core unemployed. Manpower, however, is a field in which public policy is moving rapidly. Shortly after the turn of the year, President Johnson announced his JOBS Program (Jobs Opportunities in the Business Sector) which was to be administered in part by the new National Alliance of Businessmen and which would provide sizeable Federal subsidies to private firms involved in training the hard-core unemployed. With the originally intended major role of this Appropriation thus usurped, staff has concentrated instead upon upgrading and has made two such grants from the Appropriation (one to Jobs Clearing House in Boston, the other to Skills Advancement, Incorporated, of New York).

2. Georgia Kraft did not accede to all the requests of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which had desired more drastic technical modifications in the Company's seniority system and in other promotional practices. Such changes have occurred in the industry through collective bargaining agreements inspired in part by the Office of Federal Contract Compliance (most notably with the International Paper Company), but the Courts have yet to determine if these changes are required by Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, upon which the EEOC based its requests. The Company's lawyers recommended that a test case be made of Title VI and Kraft declined to make the requested changes. Subsequently, in August 1968, a suit was filed in Federal Court against the Company and its unions by the NAACP Legal Defense Fund, acting as a third party.

The existence of this suit has caused staff and our advisor, industrial and labor relations expert Dr. Emory Via of the Southern Regional Council, to examine Kraft's proposal with more than normal care. Georgia Kraft initiated this request but does not seem to have done so merely as a ploy in its negotiations with the EEOC or in the subsequent court action. Legal Defense Fund lawyers contacted by Dr. Via indicated that the existence of the program would have no bearing on the Court's determination of the issues in the suit, (though Kraft will probably and understandably cite its efforts to mount a training program as evidence of its good faith). Messrs. Dykes and Rock of Georgia Kraft are by no means "red-necks" and seem sincerely interested in upgrading these generally Negro employees. Their attitude toward the suit is a forthright one: They disagree with the EEOC recommendations and its interpretation of Title VI, but little passion is involved and they will have little difficulty in living with an adverse Court decision. (They have so stated publicly). Hence, it is our conclusion, based in part upon Dr. Via's report (which is on file), that Georgia Kraft is in sufficient good faith and the proposed program is of sufficient value as a model both of upgrading and of equal opportunity in a rapidly changing Southern industry, for a grant to be recommended.

3. This grant would be an exception to the normal Foundation practice of making grants only to organizations which the Internal Revenue Service has determined to be tax-exempt under Section 501 (c) (3) of the Internal Revenue Code. The Foundation itself, of course, is tax exempt under Section 501 (c) (3) because it is:

> ".... organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, testing for public safety, literary, or educational purposes....."

Our own Articles of Incorporation limit our operations somewhat more tightly to ".....scientific, educational, and charitable purposes, all for the public welfare...."

While we are thus obligated to ensure that our funds are used only for these purposes, we are under no legal compulsion to ensure that the organization receiving our funds is similarly exempt; we may make a grant to any organization so long as the funds are used for exempt purposes. (A recent Revenue Ruling makes this point in unequivical terms). As a matter of practice, however, the Foundation has made grants only to similarly exempt organizations to take advantage of a built-in safeguard in so doing: since an organization with a 501 (c) (3) exemption is organized exclusively for the same purposes as the Foundation, we are more confident that our funds will be used only for permissable activities.

In this case, staff feels that an exception to this practice is warranted. The immediate purposes of the grant parallel those of many grants we have made in the past to tax exempt organizations and are clearly exempt purposes. Moreover, it would not be overly difficult to find a 501 (c) (3) organization to function as a sponsor. Our longer run purpose, however, is not merely to train 135 workers; rather, it is to conduct a demonstration with industry wide impact. That is more likely to occur if the project is run with the clear sponsorship and imprimatur of the industry's own official organization. (API is itself tax exempt but under Section 501 (c) (6), as a Business League).

In accordance with the Revenue Ruling cited above, staff does plan to take special steps to ensure that the funds are properly used. API's role has been clearly spelled out in correspondence, proposals, and negotiations, as have those of Georgia Kraft and U.S. R&D; but in addition, Dr. Via will serve as the Foundation's consultant to monitor the grantee's performance and ensure that funds are properly used.

FOR RELEASE - TUESDAY AFTERNOON
JANUARY 14, 1969

AMERICAN PAPER INSTITUTE AWARDED $141,000 GRANT BY FORD FOUNDATION. FUNDS TO BE USED FOR JOB UPGRADING DEMONSTRATION PROGRAM.

NEW YORK, N. Y., January 14, 1969 - Edwin A. Locke, Jr., President of the American Paper Institute (API), announced today that the Institute has been granted $141,000 by the Ford Foundation for a project designed to help open up avenues of promotion for employees in southern paper mills.

The conception of the project originated with Georgia Kraft Company of Rome, Georgia, a jointly-owned affiliate of Inland Container Corporation and the Mead Corporation. Utilizing the grant, API, a non-profit organization, will sponsor a demonstration program at two plants of Georgia Kraft, where special training will be given to approximately 135 employees, most of them Negro, whose education has kept them from qualifying for promotion to skilled jobs. These employees now work at the Krannert Division of the Company near Rome, Georgia, and the Mead Division of the Company at Macon, Georgia. Typically these employees are not now qualified to transfer to jobs which offer opportunities for advancement to the highest skilled and thus the highest paid jobs.

The purpose of the Ford-financed program is to demonstrate the feasibility of upgrading such employees by providing concentrated instruction aimed at overcoming educational limitations which handicap them for qualifying for more remunerative employment. The program will utilize the most up to date techniques of individual instruction, programmed training and group participation to teach basic education, human resources development and basic mechanical principles applicable to the paper industry, and the employees will be conditioned for tests such as they might face in seeking better jobs. Competition for such jobs is active, since wages paid by the southern paper industry are above the norm for the region.

The demonstration training program will be prepared and conducted by the United States Research and Development Corporation of New York City, and will include an intensive motivational and counseling service for individual employees. Georgia Kraft Company will provide the physical facilities for the program. The program grew out of the company's close study of the problems confronting under-educated employees, and was developed in close collaboration with USRD, which has done pioneering work in this field.

The training aspect of the project will cover a period of 36 weeks, beginning in February, 1969. After the employees have completed their training, their job-progress and performance will be followed for two years more through systematic reports from the employing company to the API.

In addition to monitoring and acting as fiscal agent for the project, API will arrange for an objective evaluation of the training program, and will provide detailed information on results to paper companies and to industry generally, as well as to other business associations and socially-oriented groups interested in the broad problem of upgrading the underemployed. The membership of API comprises most pulp and paper manufacturers in the United States.

For expert evaluation of the training program API has retained Dr. Joseph M. Rich, Manager, Personnel Resources, St. Regis Paper Company, and Dr. Herbert R. Northrop, Chairman, Department of Industry, Wharton School of Finance and Commerce, University of Pennsylvania.

GEORGIA KRAFT COMPANY P.O. BOX 1551, ROME, GEORGIA 30161
COMMUNITY RELATIONS MANAGER - CALL 234-0241 - A.C. 404

Columbus, Georgia, area.

For Release, 12:00 Noon
January 14, 1969

The Ford Foundation has made a grant to the American Paper Institute which it will use at Georgia Kraft Company to institute an academic training program aimed at qualifying approximately 135 Georgia Kraft Company employees who are not now qualified for general employment. R. A. Rock, Vice President Industrial and Public Relations of Georgia Kraft Company, made the announcement at Rome, Georgia today.

Rock continued by stating that the Ford Foundation provided A. P. I. with a grant of $141,000 for the program and that Georgia Kraft Company will also invest a substantial amount.

Mitchell Sviridoss, Vice President, National Affairs, of the Ford Foundation, in making the grant to the American Paper Institute said: "We are pleased to make this grant for two reasons. First, it will improve opportunities for promotion for these non-skilled and semi-skilled, largely negro employees. Secondly, and perhaps more significant in the long run, it will serve as a demonstration in the paper industry, industry in general and to the Federal Government of the values of in-plant education and the importance of up-grading employees."

According to the announcement, the program is to be conducted by the United States Research and Development Corporation, a private corporation specializing in training programs of this type. The program will be conducted exclusively for the purpose of Georgia Kraft employees at educational centers established at its Rome, Georgia, and Macon, Georgia mills. Members of industry interested in such programs will be invited to monitor the training sessions.

Explaining the program, Rock stated: "This opportunity is being made available at no cost to all employees of Georgia Kraft Company who have not qualified for general employment.

"While enrollment is voluntary, we hope that everyone of our employees who have not so qualified will choose to participate in this effort."

The program will utilize the most up-to-date techniques of individual instruction, programmed training and group participation to teach basic education, basic mechanical principles and human resource development. The program, covering a maximum period of 36 weeks, will be composed of three sessions each week. Each session will be of two hours duration. Attention will also be directed to providing individual instruction as may be needed. By this means each employee will proceed at his individual rate of progress and it is foreseen that many will complete the program in far less time than the maximum period.

Explaining how the program has been developed, Rock pointed out: "This is not a totally new effort on the part of Georgia Kraft Company.

Beginning in January of 1968, we conducted a pilot project involving a number of our employees. Both United States Research and Development Corporation and Georgia Kraft Company have thoroughly evaluated the results of the pilot effort. The results were so encouraging that it was decided to undertake the program for all employees."

The pilot project was conducted at the Columbus Industrial Education Center in collaboration with Georgia Kraft Company. The Industrial Education Center is sponsored by the Lower Chattahoochee Area Community Action Agency and is funded by the office of Economic Opportunity.

It was also announced that the full scale program will be monitored by the American Paper Institute for the purpose of reporting the results to industry in general as well as the pulp and paper industry.

In summarizing the announcement, Rock stated: "We believe that this is a major step in overcoming the obstacles placed in the path of those members of our society who for economic or other causes have not reached their full productive potential. We are confident that through this program these people will become prepared, not only to be qualified for general employment in our operations, but to play vital and appropriate roles as citizens in our growing communities. This will more than justify the cost of the program."

Georgia Kraft Company is jointly owned by Inland Container Corporation, Indianapolis, Indiana, and The Mead Corporation, Dayton, Ohio.

Dear Dr. Via:

This will confirm our conversation of January 14, 1969, where I suggested that you might want to take a look at one of our on-going programs prior to the commencement of the Georgia-Kraft operation.

At the present time we have programs in operation in Aiken, South Carolina and in Jacksonville, Florida. I suggest that you contact either Ron Schneider, Director of our Aiken Center at (803) 648-3278 or Jim DeBerry, Director of our Jacksonville Center at (904) 353-5713. They would be more than happy to have you visit their Center. I'm sure they would appreciate the opportunity to explain the program in detail and to have you observe the operation at first hand.

I enjoyed our meeting in New York, and I am looking forward to working with you in the Georgia-Kraft project.

Sincerely,

Dear Basil:

Enclosed is a report on the Georgia Kraft situation. Sorry for the length, but you will see that I have tossed the crucial decision back to you. I trust you will have adequate information and perspective from my report to assist in making it.

I would urge that this report not be shared outside of the Foundation. I would not want to run the risk of jeopardizing relations between USR&D and the Company or the trainors and USR&D for the remaining time, extension or not. This said although on its face it is not an especially loaded report in this regard, but the trainors were fairly open with me.

You will see that Rock would like an immediate answer so he will be prepared for concilliation discussions.

I will leave for an extended vacation beginning August 2. This will now be mailed to you on the fourth. My secretary, Mrs. Kathy Martin, will know where I can be reached.

I would be less than honest not to say that in terms of the men themselves, if real recruitment takes place,

I would like to see the training continued. I am not persuaded that either USR&D or the Company did all that was possible or might have been expected to avoid some of the difficulties that have arisen. And you will see that I have serious doubts as to what may be shown as a demonstration.

Sorry for the haste. Best personal wishes.

Comments by Emory F. Via on the Proposed Extension of the Training Program at the Georgia Kraft Company

August 1, 1969

Background. The training program at the Macon and Rome installations of the Georgia Kraft Company is approximately half completed. It was originally scheduled to run for thirty six weeks. Because of the low level of participation in the course at Rome, it is proposed that additional training be provided so that a much higher percentage of the eligible employees may take part. The company wants an immediate answer since it would like to propose in concilliation proceedings with EEOC that the completion of training by present employees, who originally were scored as fails on the company's employment tests, be substituted for further tests. "Completion" at this moment seems to mean 100% attendance (six hours per week for 36 weeks) with no other standard being applied. Upon completion, it is contemplated that the company will place the men into its normal lines of progression whereupon they can move up the job ladder without being trapped in a non-progressing job classification. This past practice has been one of the areas characterized as discriminatory in complaints filed with EEOC and in a court suit.

Two questions have been put to this evaluator. What is his opinion regarding the relation between the proposed extended training and the complaints before the EEOC and court. And, what can be said about the training program to date. The main thrust of this evaluation will deal with the first question. I will comment on the training program but not as a definitive or final evaluation.

Via's Initial Response. I took my first look at the training program after the program was well under way (past the 12 week mark). It was at this time that I realized the Company hoped to propose to EEOC that training be substituted for testing. It seemed to me that the relation between the training demonstration and the legal complaints had been substantially altered. In its baldest terms the Foundation was being asked to finance a portion of the Company's concilliation agreement with EEOC and that the company's proposal to EEOC and the complaining parties was contingent upon assurance that a grant for extension of training would be made. It was, and substantially is (see section V below), my feeling that this would be unwise. On July 28 I expressed my reservations to Robert Rock, Vice President of Industrial Relations of Georgia Kraft, and requested that we meet and give him an opportunity to provide me with answers to my reservations or an alternative rationale for extended support of the training. I met with him for that purpose on July 30, 1969.

The Company's Response through Mr. Rock. The company wants to insure success when the underemployed group is moved into the regular lines of progression. It feels that it would be unfair to place unprepared men into a line of progression without the ability to move up. For reasons of efficiency and fairness the company does not want to be told by rule of law that it has to place men in certain job classes where the likelihood is they would not make out. The reason for making the training a part of the EEOC agreement is to provide incentive to the trainees for participating in the course. Originally, said Rock, the use of employment tests after sufficient training was considered a way to measure progress and provide incentive for training to the workers. He reminded Via that although the original complaint to EEOC had been in 1966 that the company thought the issue was dead at the time that it sent a group of four employees to Columbus, Georgia for training to determine whether the company wished to engage in the current project.

Comments of USR&D Training Program

I have visited two training sessions, spoken with the training staff, talked with an industrial relations staff man who has visited the program several times, and had an hour discussion with six trainees who are regular and committed students of the program. Some test scores and attendance records have been available. Nevertheless, I can only give a rather superficial impression at this stage, not an evaluation. I am hampered somewhat from having come into the training phase so late in the day. I have not talked with dropouts or those who refused to come. I have only seen the Human Resource Development (HRD) sessions and not those dealing with math and English skills.

The training program has had a major problem in getting initial participation, and a substantial problem in attendance. The reasons are varied. The trainors blame the failure of some people to start primarily on a "boycott" because of alleged worries that the training was a company ploy to interfere with the legal complaints. Some men were not exactly encouraged by their immediate supervisors. There were some rather bad white reactions, some of which may have reached the black workers. The trainors and Rock feel that the continuance of testing may have proved more of a barrier to participation than an incentive to treat it seriously. Of course, the plan now is to drop the use of employment tests as a yardstick. A number of men work second jobs, some have serious family problems. In some cases where wives work, with school out there are problems at home. The summer months also meant farm work for some. There was some feeling that the men in the pilot group had not been advanced or not very quickly. At this point all but one have advanced; the one may be waiting for a particular job.

The on-site training director felt that giving the grade level determination test during the first week dampened enthusiasm. This was especially so since the strain of test taking in the first weeks was accompanied by the upsets from uncompleted physical facilities.

The training which I witnessed looked good. Good relations between instructor and group. Group responsive. The six men I talked with were clearly pro-program. But they had learned and could back it up. They were interested. Wooked reasonably hard. Sacrificed some to be there. Enjoyed the process. They also want a better job when it is over with.

The coordinating director for the two programs is not especially pleased with the twelve week improvement -- a second test of grade level was given at that time. I don't feel the improvement was outstanding either, but there was some. A few spectacular cases, a number more moderate, and of course the disappointments. The men feel that improvement in communication skills and math will help out on jobs.

The training staff was caught by surprise with the number of non-readers and the substantial difference between grade level completed in school and the grade level on the initial test. This was evidently a major factor in making the course a straight 36 week enterprise rather than two units of 18 weeks each. Though this decision may have been wise, it was prevented any job upgrading of employees in the training program. Originally it had been contemplated that employees would be tested when thought ready, if they passed they would be placed in the line of progression. This has not happened.

In summary, I am convinced that the training will be useful and stimulating to the men. It is difficult to judge at this juncture how useful it will be on the job. The more directly related material is yet to come. But the training to date for those who have taken it seriously stands to better their participation in community, union and family affairs. Although I think it can materially assist in their job performance both because of increasing their acceptability and improving ability, I think the conditions under which the program had had to proceed, the shift of standards, a somewhat contaminated atmosphere, and the lack of hard evaluation of the entrants relative to the jobs in that plant will make long run evaluation difficult and generalizations risky.

Further, I am of the opinion still (as after my initial visit September, 1968) that a substantial number of the trainees could have been successfully placed in lines of progression at any time. More of them probably could be so placed now. The trainors (granted they are not fully familiar with in-plant job requirements) estimate that 50% originally could have been so placed and more now. The question arises as to how far they could then progress without training. We do not know. I favor the training but I do not discount the likely possibility that these same men, given a fair opportunity would have learned on one job about the next job up the ladder. Even Rock would agree that a number of these men could perform adequately at the bottom of the lines of progression. He expresses substantially more reservation than I feel about their ability to move up.

Via's Observations and Recommendations.

At its present stage, and after the completion of 36 weeks, the Foundation is unlikely to have a very conclusive demonstration of what it had hoped to show about the validity of training for upgrading purposes. Noting the reservations I have already made, an extension might help. However, I think that Foundation is on the tricky ground between where a Bona fide demonstration leaves off and bailing a company out of its difficulties begins. I am not unsympathetic to the views expressed on a tape for radio broadcast by Rock and Hadddad that such training is not a matter for do gooders or bleeding hearts but an investment from which the corporation gets dividends. I have not checked, but I assume that a current intensive management training program is viewed in the same light and is paid for by the company.

I think it likely that either the EEOC concilliation agreement or a court ruling will hold that the old employment tests were at least unvalidated and perhaps just plain irrelevant. It is too bad to suggest that this elaborate a program is a substitute for such tests. The substitution could be viewed as simply a further formal road block to jobs. This is especially so since no standard of achievement is proposed. There seems to me no way for the company to avoid the time tested method for upgrading of recommendations from supervisors and a trial on the job or the exercise of seniority rights and a trail on the job. I repeat, the training, in my opinion does stand to facilitate this process. It may also ease the Company's problems with its supervisors and other employees. There is, of course, no guarantee that EEOC will accept the substitution or think that any substitute is required other than abolishing testing or coming up with an acceptable test. Presumably the Company's alternative tests to the Wonderlic will be revealed at the coming concilliation hearing on or around August 12.

It is my personal feeling that a foundation program of this sort should not be used as a bargaining point in an EEOC concilliation. An extension, however, will likely aid in proving something about the relevance of such training, despite my feelings that some of the conditions for making refined judgements cannot be reinstated.

If the Foundation sees no special problem in making an extension under these conditions, then I think it might wish to consider offering a grant on some matching basis. I see no harm in the Company's accepting more of the financial burden under the existing circumstances.

If training is extended then the Company and USR&D must come up with a much more refined plan for motivation and recruitment into the program. This is not evident at this time. Further, additional staff from USR&D must be available in sufficient quanitity and quality to realistically meet the additional training needs. In Rome alone approximately 27 persons never enrolled, 3 dropped out, 15 had less than two-thirds participation, and probably another 15 have between two-thirds and 100% attendance. This means that about sixty persons will require some additional training at widely varying levels. Half will require a full course.

Yet, More: Some Supplementary Comments.

You can gather that I am not at ease about how Northrup will be able to proceed and make any showing that will have substantial relevance. I am sure that Rock told me he had already visited Rome. However, he did not go by the training center. The staff there knew nothing of him or his potential role. Indeed, on my first visit, cleared through Rock, they had no idea who or what I was much less why. In general they have responded cooperatively and with candor. Also, the staff seems to have been inadequately informed about the EEOC and court case and its possible impact on recruitment and worker response to training.

I will be on vacation during most of the month of August. It is at present uncertain whether I will be in Atlanta on or around August 20th.

I hope to know that part of my schedule by August 18th.

I trust that I will be in town and that we will be able to get together and I am sorry for this uncertainty, but this letter itself is being dictated by phone. If I am in Atlanta on or before the 18th I will try to reach you by phone. In any case you can call my office to see what the word is.

I trust that we will be able to get together.

Dear Mr. Via:

Basil Whiting tells me that you are evaluating the Georgia Kraft project of training disadvantaged workers for the Foundation, and of course I am doing the same thing for the American Paper Institute. It is my plan to be at Georgia Kraft on August 20 to confer with the company officials and to examine the progress thus far. It occurred to me that since I have to pass through Atlanta going and coming anyway, it would be advantageous for us to get together, and I wonder if some arrangements can be made to that effect.

I look forward to hearing from you.

K.R.A.F.T. PROJECTS

U. S. R. & D. CORP./GA. KRAFT — ROME and MACON, GEORGIA

VOLUME 1, NUMBER 1 — AUGUST, 1969

First National Bank Comes To K.R.A.F.T.

Project K.R.A.F.T. in Rome, was delighted with the presence of the Director and Consultant, Mr. F. D. Hand, and the Vice President, Mr. J. W. Frank, of the First National Bank of Rome, on one of their recent visits to the Center.

These two gentlemen gave a presentation to the evening group about Banking Services offered to the individual and the role the Bank plays in the Community. It was a very interesting and highly informative session. One of the highlights of the slide presentation was the question and answer session at the end.

Mr. Hand who is a 'veteran' visitor to the project is a native of Rome and Floyd County, and is also an active Rotarian, Chairman of the Floyd Hospital Authority; Board Member - Rome Area Red Cross and a member of the Financial Executives Inst. He has also served as past president of the Rome Area Chamber of Commerce. He was formerly a Controller with West Point-Pepperell until his recent retirement.

Mr. Frank was also born and raised in Rome and Floyd County where he has served as past President of both the Rome Exchange Club and the Coosa Valley Fair Association. He is a Director of the Rome Chamber of Commerce and a member of the Rome-Floyd Planning Commission.

Dear Dr. Via:

In talking with Basil Whiting yesterday, I learned that you had never received any of the monthly reports which the United States R & D Corp. has furnished us in connection with the project at Georgia Kraft Company.

I am enclosing the four reports which we have received to date and will see that you get any future ones. We are expecting to receive one covering the period ending August 30th., very shortly.

If you have any questions, please do not hesitate to let me know.

Sincerely yours,

William B. Gittens

Dear Emery and Herb:

Just a note to thank you for your recent reports on American Paper Institute/Georgia Kraft/U. S. R & D Project.

I have talked to Bill Gittens at API and followed that up with a letter, a copy of which is attached for your information. I have also just talked to Bill Haddad and he and Gittens will submit a proposal to us taking into account the detailed recommendations, comments, and criticisms presented in Herb's letter to me, a carbon copy of which went to Gittens. As I note in the letter to Bill Gittens, your detailed comments regarding the program were very similar.

Once we have the proposal in hand we will be able to sit down with Gittens and Haddad and hit hard at those things we feel they are not adequately enough addressing.

As you will note, Emery, I'm asking Gittens to be much more energetic about keeping you informed about the project.

Do either of you have access to a copy of the final agreement signed by the company and complainant before the EOC? I would appreciate your assessment of that agreement as finally drafted.

Sincerely yours,

Basil J. Whiting

Dear Mr. Gittens:

I enjoyed talking to you on the phone about the U. S. R & D project with Georgia Kraft. I just want to follow up with a written communication re-emphasizing two of the points we discussed. First, we are interested in seeing a proposal from API for an extension of the program. Second, we take very seriously the comments and recommendations of Herbert Northrup, a copy of which you have in hand and of Dr. Emery Via, our own consultant, whose opinions are very similar to Dr. Northrup's. We think API should take each of Dr. Northrup's points into account in devising its continuation proposal.

It would also be useful if we had some estimate of the monetary value of the contribution of services and material equipment and space by Georgia Kraft to this training project. Do you think Georgia Kraft would be amenable to paying, say, 25% of the direct costs of the extension which is being requested from Ford?

Finally, it is important for API, U. S. R&D and Georgia Kraft to take more energetic steps to keep our consultant, Dr. Emery Via of Southern Regional Council, fully informed on the nature of the project and its progress.

Please feel free to call me for further discussion on any of these points on or after September 16th.

Sincerely yours,

14. TRAINING

A. In order to be considered qualified to be transferred and/or promoted into skilled and/or semi-skilled lines of progression and/or job classifications, Respondent Employer has heretofore required employees to meet certain satisfactory scores on a battery of tests. As a substitute for such requirement, Respondent Employer in conjunction with the United States Research and Development Corporation has developed and is offering to its employees a training course consisting of six (6) hours per week for 38 weeks, on the employee's own time, and it is agreed that an employee who completes such course will be qualified for transfer and/or promotion into any job in any line of progression in Respondent Employer's plant, as fully as an employee who has made satisfactory scores on the battery of tests. Such transfer and/or promotion shall be governed by the applicable provisions of the existing Collective Bargaining Agreement as modified by the provisions of this Agreement.

If job opens he can bid now!!

B. It is further agreed that an employee who is enrolled in said course (prior to completion thereof) will be eligible for transfer, as though he had completed the course, into any line of progression in Respondent Employer's mill in accordance with applicable provisions of the Collective Bargaining Agreement as modified by this Agreement. However, if such employee fails to fulfill the attendance requirement as hereinafter set forth he shall be removed from such job and returned to the job previously held.

Unless he passes existing employment tests.

C. It is anticipated that facilities and staff for the United States Research and Development Corporation training course will exceed facilities and staff necessary for the training of participating affected class employees.

In order to make maximum utilization of both facilities and staff, the Respondent Employer agrees to recruit applicants to participate in the U. S. R. & D.

training course. The number of such applicants placed in the course shall be determined by the number of affected class employees enrolled in the course subtracted from the maximum number of persons that can reasonably be accommodated in the course.

D. Facilities and staff of the U. S. R. & D. training course shall be available to employees at times other than the regularly scheduled classes in order that participants may accelerate the rate of their training and/or make up missed sessions.

E. Satisfactory attendance shall be deemed to be 90% of 216 hours, or 90% of six hours a week as long as the course is given, whichever is less.

Completely U/cased

F. An employee may miss up to six classes (12) hours due to having to work overtime and/or absence from work which is considered for satisfactory reasons under the Labor Agreement.

(7)

G. Should Respondent Employer decide to discontinue the course, it shall immediately notify those enrolled in the course, and schedule within reasonable limits as many make-up classes as employees desire for the remainder of the course. Should the course be discontinued with less than one month's notice, all employees enrolled shall then be considered qualified.

Dear Basil:

Enclosed is a copy of that section of the settlement agreement between the Georgia Kraft Company and EEOC which relates to training. This is the only portion which I have. Final language is still being worked out on some of the other sections.

You will note that some of the language is conditional turning on whether or not a "full" course is offered. Also they have modified the 100% attendance somewhat. And Section C at least raises the problem of recruitment.

I am sorry that this is so late getting to you but it just came in today. Let me know if there is anything else you require.

INTERIM REPORT: AMERICAN PAPER INSTITUTE

MANAGEMENT SYNOPSIS

As recently as early September, the Georgia Kraft project was faced with high enrollee absenteeism rates which in turn had produced a debilitating effect on the educational and attitude-training effort.

The absenteeism had its origins in a boycott of the program by potential enrollees which, in turn, had its origins in a grievance procedure pending before the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

The potential enrollees, all of them black and many of them daily working colleagues of the EEOC complainants, had concluded--erroneously--that participation in the training project would somehow weaken the EEOC complaint.

The EEOC complaint, which had lain dormant for several years after its submission in 1966, was a "hidden agenda" faced by U.S. R&D during the early implementation stages of the contract.

In early September, U.S. R&D brought in a new director for the project and initiated a broad-gauged recontact and re-recruitment campaign. Meanwhile, the company made its long-pending announcement that training would be substituted for testing for veteran employes, thus providing an important new motivational factor for potential enrollees.

Georgia Kraft and R&D conducted several evaluations and held several meetings to map a strategy based on new information and a change in circumstances. It is important to note that the plans which emerged covered all problems to date.

This report details steps taken since that time to increase the scope and improve the effectiveness of the project.

INTRODUCTION

This report summarizes and puts into perspective the activities of the United States R & D Corporation in the conduct of a basic education and attitudinal training program at the two plants of the Georgia Kraft Company. The program is sponsored by the American Paper Institute and financially supported by the Ford Foundation and Georgia Kraft.

The report is a supplement to the periodic status reports submitted by the project, and is occasioned by the necessity to report in some depth on the problems encountered in the implementation of the contract and the solutions devised.

The report is based on internal management studies of the project by U.S. R&D, and draws on the evaluations conducted by Georgia Kraft staff and Herbert R. Northrup of the Wharton School of Finance and Commerce.

While differing in some details, these studies and evaluations are striking in the unanimity of their conclusions and recommendations. This report details the extent to which the recommendations have been carried out.

BACKGROUND--THE ORIGINAL CONTRACT AND EARLY OPERATIONAL MODIFICATIONS

Under terms of a contract between the American Paper Institute and the United States R & D Corporation, the latter firm was to conduct a training program for "all 135" veteran Georgia Kraft employes who had not gained access to the so-called "lines of progression" in Kraft's two plants.

The proposal said that at the time the proposal was approved, there were 55 such employes in the company's Macon Division and 80 such employes at the Rome Division.

The proposal envisioned a 36-week training program split into two cycles of 18 weeks each. According to the proposal, 35 students in Macon and 50 students in Rome would be enrolled in the first cycle. At its conclusion, it was estimated that 20 enrollees in Macon and 30 enrollees in Rome would be ready to "graduate"--to take and pass the Bennett and Wonderlic tests used by the company to determine qualification for entry into the lines of progression.

The non-graduates, 15 in Macon and 20 in Rome, would continue in the program through the second cycle, to be joined by 20 new students in Macon and 30 new students in Rome, none of whom had attended first-cycle classes. Thus, it was believed, 100 students could be prepared for the tests on the basis of 18 weeks' exposure to training, while 35 students would require 36 weeks to become test-ready.

This timetable was overly optimistic, since the proposal's implication was that almost three-fourths of the enrollees would require only 16 weeks to reach test-readiness.

In point of fact, about 45 Kraft employes were found to be non-readers, while another 40 had educational achievement levels so low that it was a practical impossibility to raise them to test-readiness on the basis of 108 hours of training (six hours a week for 18 weeks, the proposal's projected classroom time). Accordingly, and in consultation with Georgia Kraft corporate management, U.S. R&D determined that the original two-cycle training schedule would have to be modified in order to provide more extensive training for larger numbers of trainees than those contemplated in the proposal.

U.S. R&D's enrollment strategy was to offer enrollment to "all 135" eligible Kraft employes at the initiation of the training period in March, 1969, with the thought that relatively high-achieving employes could be graduated after the first 18 weeks and that the others could be continued to the point when they were test-ready. In part, this was a decision dictated by the practical fact that U.S. R&D would have to interview all potential enrollees during the pre-implementation period in any case, to determine academic achievement and interest, and there seemed to be no reason not to conduct enrollment at the same time.

In the course of the pre-enrollment interviews, three additional problems presented themselves:

1. Potential enrollees had come to believe that the training time would be somehow stipended, either by Kraft or under funding-source auspices. This expectation may have come because the four Kraft employes who attended the Columbus training pilot did receive pay and subsistence from the company, or it may have been a rumor circulated on behalf of the EEOC complainant group designed to discourage participation in the training program. In any event, when U.S. R&D interviewers reported that there would be no stipends, and that the training would be conducted on a voluntary basis outside of work hours, some disaffection resulted.

2. Mass enrollment presented certain scheduling difficulties which had not been foreseen. Four different daily shift schedules, plus a periodic 10-days-on, four-days-off schedule, led to difficulties in setting training hours. This same difficulty probaby would have been encountered if the original enrollment proposal had been followed, but the heavy front-end load on recruitment clearly exacerbated it. The solution, which produced a heavy training schedule on Mondays, Tuesdays and Wednesdays, with Thursdays and Fridays as make-up days, was inimical to optimum training procedures, even though it was consonant with the original proposal's pledge that class scheduling would be left in the hands of the enrollees.

3. The voluntary and unstipended nature of the training, plus the scheduling difficulties, led to a situation in which U.S. R&D staff was unable to construct "hard" scheduling of training hours, and was forced, instead, to provide training for any employe whenever he appeared at a project office. Despite consistent U.S. R&D efforts to regularize individual training schedules, successes came slowly.

Other intervening factors here--all of them outside of U.S. R&D control--included part-time out-of-plant employment (particularly in construction in the summer) by potential enrollees, instances of individuals' self-confidence lacks so severe as to preclude training participation without extensive attitudinal groundwork, summer vacation schedules, and car-pooling and family-responsibility problems. In the latter category were life-styles which made Thursday-night family shopping activities an unalterable requirement for working husbands, as well as time required for small-plot garden-farming.

None of these impediments to quick implementation of the training program were insoluble, but they did require modifications in the original work-plan. The first and most important of these, as mentioned earlier, was the decision to undertake mass enrollment, rather than the phased enrollment contemplated by the proposal.

During the pre-enrollment interviewing phase, U.S. R&D also discovered that the total potential enrollment had been somewhat overestimated, and that it was overly optimistic (at least at that time) to expect every eligible candidate to participate in the training program. An attachment to this report is a summary of enrollee training commitments elicited during the initial interviews. It is interesting to note that some individuals reported that they would not participate in the training under any circumstances because they were "not interested." This reaction may have had to do with the attitudes based on the EEOC complaint, in which case re-interviewing should produce notable changes; but U.S. R&D, on the basis of staff reports based on repeated contacts with the potential enrollees, now believes that there are at least 15 Georgia Kraft employes who will not undertake training under any circumstances, and U.S. R&D believes the total corpus of potential enrollees should be reduced to 120. This judgment parallels that of Georgia Kraft corporate management.

This judgment is not in any way preclusive of the right of any non-line-of-progression Kraft employe to receive the training; it means only that a 120 figure is more realistic than the original proposal's 135, and that the meaning of the contract should be modified accordingly. (Meanwhile, see below, efforts will be made to afford training to a number of potential Kraft employes in advance of their selection.)

The mass-enrollment strategy had the effect of producing "peaks" and "valleys" of attendance. For the most part, the peaks came between 4 and 5 p.m., as employes from both the regular day-shift and the rotating 8-to-4 shift converged on the training centers, sometimes producing student loads of 30 or more.

Handling these numbers presented little problem for Human Resource Development sessions, but it was difficult to achieve coherence in the basic education sessions, where it had been hoped to achieve a grouping on the basis of achievement level.

The voluntary nature of the training program meant that there could be no assurance of individual attendance and groupings were necessarily somewhat haphazard.

Other factors--notably the boycott--were important contributors to the high absentee rate, as is shown by the marked progress exhibited by the trainees whose attendance has been regular and whose educational achievement has improved measurably.

A different problem was encountered in the conduct of the Human Resource Development sessions: Attendance at individual classes occasionally so low that the group did not reach "critical mass"--e.g., did not receive sufficient internal stimulus to create the group interaction necessary to attitudinal exploration and change.

The HRD curriculum and casebook is based on an optimum group size of 12, and several more can be handled comfortably; but groups which sometimes went as low as four or five attendees stifled the group process and thus the learning process.

In the original proposal U.S. R&D specified that the educational program at Georgia Kraft would be modified to make content specifically germane to the paper-making industry and the jobs therein. It was anticipated that this would be done through a regularized relationship between first-line managers and U.S. R&D trainers, with the former explaining the jobs in the factories to the trainers and the latter explaining the content of the program.

This relationship has been slow to materialize. Professor Northrup has commented on Georgia Kraft's policy of giving U.S. R&D a "free hand" in training, but he apparently failed to recognize that the Kraft policy was seen by U.S. R&D staff as part of a larger one--that of isolating the trainers, and the training, from the mainstream of Georgia Kraft activity.

This unfortunate divergence of objectives and approaches has slowed the creation, for instance, of an "industrial vocabulary" tied to paper-making for inclusion in the basic education program.

This vocabulary would have come, we are convinced, through a reasonably open exchange of information between Kraft's supervisors and U.S. R&D staff.

The fact that until recently (see below) such an exchange had not come to pass is an unfortunate--although inadvertant--product of the "free hand" philosophy.

In any case, it must be stated that curriculum modifications to make the educational program more closely attuned with paper-making were slow to come. The fact that the changes have now been made is an important breakthrough.

NEW THRUSTS

The above "ancient history" of the Kraft project highlights the problems faced, rather than focusing on the successes. In carrying out a new program, these problems serve to open the door to the solutions which are necessary for long-term replicability of the project in other places.

These problems were first articulated comprehensively in an internal U.S. R&D management study of the Kraft project in early August, and were followed by the Northrup evaluation and a series of recommendations by Georgia Kraft's vice president for industiral and public relations, Robert A. Rock. Since that time, the project has undergone a thorough-going turnaround, and it is only in light of the foregoing that the present thrust of the project can be understood.

The new directions are outlined below, with commentary where appropriate, and were arrived at through discussions between Mr. Rock and William F. Haddad, chairman of U.S. R&D:

1. In line with a changed emphasis a project director with new specialties was employed. This man is a veteran U.S. R&D administrator, who has been responsible for the success of several U.S. R&D projects in the South. His first and most important mandate is to improve the Kraft middle echelon and R&D communications flow and to enlist trainees and first-line management in assuring the success of the project. He will devote full time to the job and live in Rome, Georgia.

2. A revised staffing formula has been adopted. Whereas the original budget made provision for a training staff of only two at Macon (and three at Rome), an internal staff redeployment brings total training staff at each plant to three--a training director and two trainers.

3. In keeping with the goal of increasing communication and sharing of knowledge, Kraft and U.S. R&D have agreed to:

a. Regularization of problem-solving meetings between U.S. R&D trainers and Kraft personnel, centering on--but not limited to--discussions of enrollment and re-enrollment strategies.

b. Regular plant tours by U.S. R&D personnel with Industrial Relations assistance, the purpose being an increase in trainers' knowledge of paper-making methods and procedures, and subsequent incorporation of such knowledge into educational curricula.

c. Regular appearances at training sessions by Kraft supervisors, who will discuss job requirements and mill production necessities.

d. Establishment of organizational hierarchies within both U.S. R&D and Kraft staffs, to ensure the thorough discussion of problems at an operational level before they reach a management level.

e. Publication of a brochure explaining the training program's aims and procedures for distribution to all Kraft employes and potential employes.

4. A major re-interviewing and re-recruitment plan is being implemented, under which each potential trainee not now attending classes is being contacted again--in the plant and, where necessary, at home--with the goal of increasing attendance. Coupled with this re-interview effort is an explanation of the new Kraft policy substituting training for test-passage, and it is hoped that a remarkable increase in enrollment will be achieved.

5. In those cases in which new enrollment efforts fail, U.S. R&D and Kraft staffs will discuss tactics; if Kraft assistance looks to be helpful, Kraft will be asked to participate through individual counseling of potential enrollees.

6. U.S. R&D is undertaking a curriculum revision designed to make its basic education component more relevant to in-plant knowledge needs and its HRD curriculum more cognizant of recurring stress-accomodation situations in the plants. A new "industrial vocabulary" element is being added to the basic education format, and improved relationships with foremen should lead to franker discussion of in-plant problems.

7. Because of continuing attendance uncertainties, as outlined above, U.S. R&D will further develop--and will continue to emphasize--the "home study" aspects of the basic education curriculum. Specifically, tape recorders--as well as workbooks--will be made available for out-of-plant study under a plan which will place major emphasis on home-loan individual responsibility.

8. An academic gains schedule will be constructed for each trainee by U.S. R&D, under which periodic results of objective tests will be made available to API, the Ford Foundation and Georgia Kraft so that an assessment can be made of individual enrollee progress and the relative effectiveness of teaching mechanisms.

9. In a new thrust beyond the scope of the contract, U.S. R&D has agreed to provide training for a limited number of job applicants in advance of their being hired by Georgia Kraft, making possible a somewhat more flexible recruiting capability than now exists. It is anticipated that a number of black job applicants, for instance, will be able--with the help of advance training--to pass the Wonderlic and Bennett tests and thus to find line-of-progression employment which earlier would have been closed to them.

* * * * *

An element of the Georgia Kraft project not sufficiently exploited is its role as a harbinger of coming events--the corporate commitment, the venture of a major philanthropic entity to move toward the solution of a localized difficulty, the use of an outside training firm, the possibilities for replication of the program elsewhere.

The resolution of the EEOC dispute will undoubtedly have industry-wide--if not region-wide--applications, and it may be that without adequate public and corporate relations, these results will be lost on the firms most in need of guidance.

Therefore, although outside the scope of the U.S R&D-API contract, it is anticipated that a major public education task be undertaken as soon as results justify the effort.

CONCLUSION

It is the opinion of the Georgia Kraft Company that the project has been a success and that the problems encountered, and reported candidly here, make it possible not only to improve on this program, but to insure that it can be copied by others elsewhere.

When measured against the success and the problems of other attempts, in the view of Georgia Kraft, it is far and away the most successful.

It is the opinion of R&D that the basic problem of absenteeism, which is at the core of this report, was the EEOC situation. With that clarified, the project can move ahead.

Dear Emory:

Thanks for sending me a copy of the settlement agreement between Georgia Kraft and the EEOC.

It is an interesting agreement, but I am a bit confused on a couple of points. Is the company still going to give tests to those trying to move into the skilled or semi-skilled lines of progressions? Is it true that attendance is the only criterion of success? Is it true that a man who could pass the tests will still have to attend the course? Is it true that the man who within a few weeks progresses rapidly enough to be able to pass the test will still have to complete the course? Is there no standard of performance which is agreed upon as necessary for advancement?

Not to cannot employees if they take training

At the time of the agreement yes — now seems to be modified slightly

STATEMENT BY ROBERT ROCK, OF GEORGIA KRAFT

November, 1969

Received Dec 4, 1969 E.F.V.

I believe that this project will provide the paper industry with the answers to some of its critical long range problems. In recent months, I have had the opportunity to review other industry attempts to upgrade locked-in employees and, without doubt, this program far exceeds what others have been able to accomplish.

That is not to say that this project has not had its problems; it has. Many have been intense and difficult. Some are unresolved. Yet it is the solution of these problems which has provided us with the knowledge which we believe will have a lasting impact on our entire industry; and, in fact, for other industries which are attempting to expedite the upgrading of employees whose educational background has not prepared them for advancement.

I believe it is essential to complete this project, not only for the benefit of those who are succeeding, but as a possible model for the paper industry.

This is a request for a nine months extension of the program beginning on December 29, 1969 and ending on September 25, 1970.

Runs into Summer recess

During that time, under terms of a settlement tentatively recently reached between the unions, the Georgia Kraft Company, and NAACP and the government (EEOC), all students who attend the United States R&D school will not only be immediately eligible for advancement (the pre-requisite tests having been eliminated by this agreement) but each will be entitled to seniority based on his length of employment with the corporation. This is a variation of the previous proposal which envisioned training the locked-in employees to pass a mandated company test.

If attendance drops close it rather than jeopardize the mens status

The new agreement is a significant alteration of industry practice. Even where tests have been eliminated, no requirement has been established for additional educational attainment. That this method of attainment has the support of all the parties in the dispute indicates that a precedent may have been established not only for one industry, but for other industries facing similar problems.

At this writing the precise attendance required for "completion" is still being negotiated; it will not be below ninety percent. The union and the NAACP have agreed to stress the need for this education beyond just mere attendance, and tests will be conducted to indicate achievement. EU

R&D will also establish procedures and tests to enable some students to graduate earlier than the 36 weeks now required. However, efforts will be made to keep the students in the classes as long as possible, offering them increasingly more difficult assignments, to better prepare them for broader work opportunities and a more fulfilling life. EU

In addition, space and staff permitting, potential employees of the corporation who now lack the pre-requisites for initial employment will also be admitted to the school, and those who perform well will be selected for employment. What this does, in effect, is to open up entry-level employment to members of the community, white and black, who do not have the necessary educational qualifications for entry-level jobs in a growing industry. As stated, this will be done only in synchronization with the availability of instructors and positions based on the in-plant attendance.

R&D has agreed to provide, at no additional cost, the materials and hardware necessary to carry out this phase of the program. It is estimated that this can be considered at $30,000 industrial in-kind contribution. Any educational materials remaining after the project, will be used in an on-going version of this project which will be undertaken by Georgia Kraft.

add to fund to fact already available ?

For conducting the extension of the program, R&D is charging only for the normal operating expenditures, waiving additional costs which may be incurred as a result of additional materials or hardware beyond that contracted for under the first agreement between the American Paper Institute and the Ford Foundation. It is anticipated that the larger time frame of the program will require additional hardware and additional materials. Also, R&D is constantly revising its materials and adding to the basic educational content. These modernizations will be added at no additional cost.

EV

During this additional time frame all eligible employees will be encouraged to participate. There is no doubt that an informal boycott was undertaken by the black employees in order to stall some participation in the course pending outcome of the EEOC actions. Now that this has been resolved, the employees have again shown good faith with R&D by demonstrating its support of the program. The president of one of the black unions, who had "gently" resisted the program during negotiation with EEOC, has joined the school, and participated four hours the first day. He has authorized publication of this information throughout the plant. This gesture, in effect, ends the "informal, partial" boycott.

When and how shown

At the outset of the program it was anticipated that only a small number of employees would not be able to read and write. This was grossly underestimated. Over 40 were in this category. However, this problem has been solved by a reallocation of efforts and the design of special courses. In the extension, this will no longer be a problem.

? It no

Classes are now being geared for three levels of learning and students will be grouped according. These groups are: zero-zero (neither read nor write), intermediate and advanced.

There have been personnel changes in the R&D operation of the program. A new senior administrator, Al Varn, has been placed in charge of the program, and the staff was enlarged at Macon. A number of the recommendations made to the Ford Foundation, to Georgia Kraft and to R&D by its own evaluators, have already been included in the program and are either implemented or in the process of being implemented. These are carefully detailed in the appendix.

A total of 100 students will be expected to attend during the extended period.

SUMMARY:

The request for the additional time required to complete the program stems from a combination of factors, the most significant of which was the union's "gentle" boycott of the program pending the settlement of the dispute with the EEOC. It is significant that all the parties to that dispute were careful to insist that any solution be based on successful attendance at the school, and throughout the negotiations, the school was not the subject of any public controversy. In order to protect its position, the union seems to have established a delicate balance between those who attended and those who did not. Full attendance and a delay in an EEOC decision would have eliminated the problem and weakened their case. All of that is now washed away. There is open and active support of the school.

There is no doubt that other problems were uncovered during the first months of the program, but, to USR&D, these are normal operational problems which are frequently encountered when you enter uncharted waters under storm conditions. As a result, improvements have been suggested and agreed upon. There is no doubt that the nine months will produce new problems, but not on the scale or the intensity of the first nine months. R&D, unlike typical corporations, expects to encounter problems and maintains an administrative flexibility to cope with them. For R&D, successful management is reaching a difficult goal without public controversy.

The thrust now, it seems, is not only with the workers in the classroom, but the management in the plants. Georgia Kraft has cleared the way for that close cooperation and the first meetings following this understanding have been unusually productive.

The next nine months will not only be "more of the same" but the conclusion of a historical milestone in the advancement of black people in industry. Together we have created a model which is acceptable to the workers (since it leads to the elimination of what they consider irrelevant tests) and to the management (which admires the voluntary aspect of self-improvement). It is acceptable to the government because it is a precedent and acceptable to the NAACP because it opens the door to the advancement of the specific individuals for whom they were legal advocates.

Rindskopf ?

Other corporations have already begun to visit the Ford experimental program and it appears that the model may be replicated not only in the paper industry, but elsewhere.

GEORGIA KRAFT AND U.S.R. & D. HAVE AGREED TO THE FOLLOWING REFINEMENT OF THE TRAINING PROGRAM: REF

1. U.S.R. & D. Personnel

   a. A new administrator, Al Varn, has been selected to emphasize the thrust needed in this second phase of the operation. He will live in Rome and divide his time between the two projects.

   b. A Training Director and two Trainers are assigned to the two centers.

   c. All U.S.R. & D. personnel are assigned full time to this project.

   d. Regularly scheduled visits and evaluations of the program from U.S.R. & D. Corporate Offices are authorized. Supervision of this aspect of the program is the responsibility of Martin Lefkowitz.

   e. Georgia Kraft has scheduled bi-weekly plant tours for the entire U.S.R. & D. staff.

   f. Varn is now working closely with Bill Sloan and will submit periodic progress reports as requested.

2. Enrollment

   a. A re-interview of a majority of eligible employees to obtain an understanding of employees' needs will be conducted. Results of interviews to be discussed with Bill Sloan so interviewer can obtain the best possible perspective.

   b. A brochure is being prepared especially for eligible employees, but will also be distributed to all employees. The brochure will contain pictures and explanation of what the training can do for eligible employees and further explain project to all others concerned.

   c. Visits to eligible employees in their homes will be continued.

MEMORANDUM

TO: WILLIAM B. GITTENS

FROM: AL VARN

DATE: DECEMBER 19, 1969

STATUS REPORT - GEORGIA KRAFT INDUSTRIAL EDUCATION CENTER:

This report is a summary of the activities and developments in the Georgia Kraft Project from the time of my arrival on October 15, 1969 through the present date.

PRIORITIES ESTABLISHED

Previous to and shortly after my arrival, a series of meetings were held between Georgia Kraft and U. S. R&D personnel. Taking full note of the problems already encountered and the lessons already learned, the meetings helped us establish the following list of priorities for action. As several projects were scheduled to happen simultaneously, the number sequence is not necessarily an assignment of importance.

1. Assign a full time project director who would live in Rome, Georgia.

2. Implement a forceful recruiting campaign to attract and hold a greater number of eligible workers. This campaign would include the use of the following facts and techniques:

a. The Kraft decision to eliminate tests as a progression requirement if the worker completes the required course at one of the Centers;

b. A printed brochure describing the aims and benefits of the program;

c. Personal contact, and if need be, visits to the homes of the eligible workers;

d. Advising the company when a recruiting attempt has been unsuccessful, so that management can have a chance to persuade the reluctant worker to attend.

3. Assign a full staff complement of one training director and two instructors at each Center.

4. Have all staff members attend a one-day orientation meeting sponsored by the Wharton School of Business and Finance. This session would be designed to give a thorough briefing on the past and present employment of black people in the paper industry and background information on the paper industry.

5. Schedule regular weekly meetings and class incolvements with Kraft supervisors and industrial foremen. These meetings would be attended by all U. S. R&D personnel.

6. Revise both HRD and Basic Education curricula to more closely fit the industrial setting of this project.

7. Submit progress reports to Kraft on a regular basis.

8. Require all U. S. R&D personnel to become completely familiar with the paper making process. This would necessitate frequent plant tours and closer relationships with Kraft supervisory personnel.

PROGRESS AND FUTURE PLANS

Using the same numbered priorities, the following progress and plans have been made:

1. A new director has been assigned and as soon as his FHA housing loan is approved, he will be a resident of Rome.

2. A new recruiting drive has been started. With the exception of the brochure, which should be available within a few days, all of the described techniques are being used. The combined results show that eight (8) new trainees have signed up; ten (10) inactive trainees have come back into the program; and an additional fourteen (14) eligible Kraft employees have shown considerable interest and are listed as potential trainees.

3. Macon has a full staff. Rome has a training director and one instructor. The other instructor for Rome has been identified and will join the staff shortly.

4. This one-day orientation meeting with the Wharton School has been scheduled by our New York office and will occur during the month of January.

5. Weekly meetings are now scheduled and are occurring between Kraft and U. S. R&D personnel.

6. Curriculum revision is now under way. The Basic Education program will be strengthened by the use of new materials from U. S. R&D. These include a non-readers course, a GED course, a physics course, and a home study kit. These new materials are expected during the month of January. The HRD segment has been extensively revised into three parts entitled My Company, My Job, and Myself. This curriculum is designed for close coordination with the Basic Education course and calls for considerable involvement on the part of Kraft supervisors.

7. Except on an informal basis, status reports have not yet been made to Kraft. This will be started immediately.

8. The familiarization program is under way. Plant tours have already been made and U. S. R&D people have established an open-door policy to the offices of most of the Kraft supervisors.

Although the basic priorities have been covered in the above section, I feel that the following topics are worthy of further elaboration:

RECRUITING:

We are talking to eligible trainees on every possible occasion. We have visited them in their homes, on their jobs, and everywhere else we could find them. Probably the most effective method we have devised so far is the practice of setting up half-hour interviews on company time, with the interview being held in our Centers.

Regardless of method used however, we are at times confronted with a small hard core group of workers who seem to have made up their minds that they will not attend the Centers under any circumstances. Part of their reluctance may stem from the rush of the Christmas season so I hesitate, at this time, to speculate on possible deeper, underlying reasons. At any rate, we are continuing our efforts and we have several promises from potential trainees to show up after the New Year.

ENROLLMENT:

Counting our new sign-ups, our enrollment now presents the following picture:

Total Eligible For Training	- 120
Total Who Signed Up For Program	- 93
Still Trying To Recruit	- 27

Out of the 93 who have signed up:

Attending on a Regular Basis	- 50
Attending On a Sometime Basis	- 33
Not Attending At All	- 10

Our major recruiting efforts are now aimed at the 27 workers who have never signed up plus the 10 trainees who dropped out after enrolling. We are also doing our persuasive best to make regulars out of the 33 inconsistents.

Of significant interest are the activities of those trainees who, through using our facilities, have already qualified for the Kraft progression ladder. Nine of our trainees are in this category: seven (7) put in enough hours to qualify and two more passed the non-mandatory tests.

Out of these nine (9) people who are no longer required to attend our Center in order to be qualified for better jobs, eight are still attending classes on a regular basis. This continued interest is a source of great personal satisfaction for the entire staff of the project.

COMMUNITY ACTIVITIES:

Although not covered by the priority list, U. S. R&D personnel have broadened the scope of their activities in the Rome and Macon communities. As of this date, they have conducted HRD classes in the elementary schools in Macon and have been asked to return for other sessions. They have done the same thing at Mercer University with the same results. Mercer is now exploring the possibility of our people acting as the third party in the event of student-faculty disputes.

OVERVIEW:

I am vastly encouraged by the spirit being shown by both the project staff and the officials of Georgia Kraft. There is common agreement on the objectives of the program and the inter-company cooperation has been outstanding.

There is also common recognition of the fact that problems have existed in the past, that some are existing now, and that more will probably show up in the future. These obstacles have been dealt with, are being dealt with, and with the spirit now being shown by staff, will be dealt with even more speedily in the future.

RE: PROJECT KRAFT - STATUS FOR DECEMBER 1969

This report is a brief summary of the developments and activities of the Georgia Kraft Project for the month of December 1969.

Following the outline of last month's report, the same format will be used here. Again, as several projects were scheduled to happen simultaneously, the sequence does not necessarily reflect importance.

PRIORITIES ESTABLISHED AND PROGRESS

(1) A full-time project director has established his residence in Rome, Georgia.

(2) A forceful recruiting campaign has been instituted, making use of the following procedures:

a) Georgia Kraft has adopted a new policy of allowing an employee, enrolled in the R&D training program, to bid on jobs and transfer into lines of progression on the agreement that he will continue his training and successfully complete the program.

b) A brochure has been designed and is now in the hands of Georgia Kraft officials for their remarks, additions or changes. It is expected to go to the printer this week.

c) Personal interviews are being held with eligible employees who either have not enrolled or who dropped after brief attendance. This involves the training director coming in as early as 6:00 a.m. or staying as late as 9:00 or 10:00 p.m. in order to see these men. Home visitations are being used, as well as seeing men in their neighborhoods, in continuing staff efforts at recruiting.

d) Written reports are being submitted to the Industrial Relations Departments each time a potential enrollee is counselled, thus enabling the IR managers to have a chance to encourage the employee to attend training.

(3) Curriculum revision has included job-related vocabulary, mathematics and training in the operation of a calculator, all pertinent to operations at Kraft. Attached is a vocabulary list which is used in both HRD and Basic Education classes. A class in the operation of a calculator for those men wishing to progress to the Scaling Department of the Wood Yard has been instituted and men assigned by the IR Department are being instructed.

(4) In Macon, the master mechanic of the Maintenance Department spoke to the combined afternoon groups on the relationship of his department to the overall operation of Georgia

Kraft, the importance of the training program and its relationship to each trainee's job, his family and himself. It is hoped that this kind of supervisory involvement will be the frequent procedure in both locations.

ENROLLMENT AND ATTENDANCE

The course of attendance took a sharp decline toward the end of the month. The reasons for this were the last minute details of the holidays.

However, immediately after the holiday season, attendance remained at an ebb. Follow-up by the staff showed an increase in overtime and the inclement weather as chief factors in the attendance problem. In one case, eleven trainees who previously had good attendance records were found to be working ten and twelve hour shifts in the plant.

Enrollment figures as of this date are:

	Rome	Macon
Total Eligible for Training	65	48
Total Who Signed For Program	43	43
Still Trying to Recruit	22	5

Out of the 43 in both locations who have signed for program:

Attending on a Regular Basis	14	19
Not Attending At All	9	8
Attending on an Occasional Basis	9	6
Number of Men Now Qualified	11	10

Of the eleven men in Rome who are qualified, none have elected to bid on job openings posted because of wanting to wait for their particular job preference to come available. Three men, not yet qualified, but enrolled in the program, have been transferred to jobs in the lines of progression as a direct result of their affiliation with the training center. Follow-up is being conducted with these men every week to insure their stability in their new positions.

COMMUNITY ACTIVITIES

The Rome staff has made contact with the Guidance Department of a local Junior High School which has requested the training director to conduct an in-school Human Resources Development class in an effort to bring about closer harmony within the student body. Berry College, of nearby Mount Berry, Georgia, is exploring the possibilities of instituting the same type of program on their campus.

Macon staff has been working closely with Mercer University officials, assisting them in the planning and development of a community services center.

KRAFT VOCABULARY

The following words have been taken from the various jobs in the production operation of Kraft. Write and learn the definitions of these words. You should become familiar with and use these words daily because they are used in all lines of progression.

RE: STATUS REPORT - GEORGIA KRAFT PROJECT

DATE: APRIL 15, 1970

NEW DIRECTOR

John Mansager, a U. S. R&D employee for the past 2 1/2 years, was appointed Director of the Kraft Project on March 15, 1970. Prior to this assignment, he served as Director of Training at R&D Industrial Education Centers in Bridgeton, New Jersey, Charleston, South Carolina and Columbus, Georgia. He and his family are now residing in Rome, Georgia.

STATISTICS

Presently, twenty-eight members of the affected class group have qualified for lines of progression -- fifteen men in Rome, and thirteen men in Macon. Of those not yet qualified, it is projected that forty-one men will qualify by the end of the program, in August 1970. This projection is based on the number of hours the trainees have presently completed and their continuing to attend classes for a minimum of six hours per week.

In addition to the above, twenty-four men have completed some hours, and could potentially qualify if they completed more than the required six hours per week.

ATTENDANCE

Attendance during the past couple of weeks has been on the up-swing, particularly at the Rome Center. This appears to have resulted from several factors:

(1) The Industrial Relations managers at both the Rome and Macon plants personally called each of the eligible men into their offices and encouraged them to become more actively involved in the program.

(2) The members of the eligible group have been motivated to more seriously consider bidding for jobs in other lines of progression because of a recent court decree which recognized seniority based on length of time employed rather than length of time on a particular job. This will enable them to maintain their present seniority status should they get into another line of progression. Of course to get into another line of progression, they need to be qualified. Hence, an increased interest in our program.

(3) At the Rome plant, three members of the training group have successfully bid for jobs previously closed to them. This has provided encouragement for the others to maintain their attendance.

(4) Finally, there has been an increasing awareness on the part of some of the more influential members of the eligible group that the program ought to be taken seriously, since it is the fastest way for them to meet qualification standards (they would prefer no test or educational requirements.). Their current positive attitude toward the program, strongly encouraged by R&D staff, has had a positive effect on others.

In addition, eight of the trainees at the Rome Center who qualified by completing the required number of hours have enrolled in a special, GED preparation program. The objective of this program is to help them acquire the skills needed to pass the General Equivalency Degree test, and receive their high school diplomas.

NEW PROGRAM

In April, a new program will be undertaken at both the Rome and Macon Centers. Each Center will enroll ten men who are not presently employees of Georgia Kraft. The twenty enrollees will be selected from applicants who have come close to passing Georgia Kraft qualifying tests, and who are acceptable for employment in every other way.

They will be given a fifteen-week program with the objective of helping them develop the skills needed for qualifying. The program will culminate in their re-taking the test battery. Thos who successfully complete the tests will be offered employment with Georgia Kraft as openings occur.

Classes will be held two hours a night, three nights a week. Enrollment at each Center will consist of seven Negro and three white trainees.

HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT TRAINING

Efforts are presently underway to get Georgia Kraft supervisory personnel more actively involved in the program. Wednesdays have been set aside as Human Resources Development (HRD) day. Whenever feasible, supervisors and other administrative personnel will be invited to participate in these sessions. The first session under the new training schedule involved the Assistant Superintendent of the Pulp Mill in attendance at the Rome Center.

Other training exercises and objectives for the remaining months of the program have been delineated and scheduled by R&D and Kraft personnel:

ADULT BASIC EDUCATION

These sessions are designed to enable the trainees to successfully perform those jobs they may advance to. Trainees will participate in the following exercises:

(1) How to Take a Test... a program disigned to help persons take tests effectively.

(2) Principles of Physics (Machines)... a program designed to help persons understand how machines work, the basic laws of physics regarding machines.

(3) The Paper Making Process: A Reader... A reader designed to both help the trainees understand the paper making process, and develop vocabulary related to the process.

(4) Paper Mill Math... A math curriculum designed to help the trainees learn those mathematical processes needed to perform the jobs for which they may bid.

(5) Communications Skills... Exercises designed to help trainees develop skills at both giving and receiving verbal information, specifically related to job tasks.

(6) Completing Forms... Exercises designed to help them develop skills at completing those forms employees are normally required to complete

(7) U. S. R&D Basic Education Program... Programmed materials designed to help people develop general reading, math and language skills.

(8) Continuing Education... A survey of local education opportunities available to trainees.

In addition, other kinds of reading exercises will be given, such as the newspaper and comprehension exercises at helping trainees both understand Georgia Kraft processes, and develop reading skills.

HRD SESSIONS

These sessions are designed to help the trainees develop the personal skills necessary for them to participate effectively in work group situations. The emphasis is on behavior and attitude, with tasks designed to help them gather the information they need to make sound descisions regarding their future.

Since one of the objectives of the program is to help people develop effective group behavior, all sessions will be conducted in small groups, using principles of small group process.

Following are the tasks the groups will be presented with:

(1) Human Relations...(an underlying agenda for all sessions) Orientation to groups and group membership; briefing on HRD program; assessment of group attitudes and feelings regarding themselves.

(2) Information Gathering...Resource person (IR) clarifying "affected class" status, role of program, responsibilities of trainees, lines of progression (charts and illustrations); follow-up discussion of trainees' attitudes toward this.

(3) Information Gathering...Background of Georgia Kraft/the paper industry (movie); the paper making process.

(4) Orientation to the different departments; kinds of jobs in each; skills required; lines of progression; Resource Person: supervisor; slides; (this will take as many sessions as there are departments.)

(5) Information Gathering: Plant tour...a look at and description of the various jobs and processes. Tour guides needed.

(6) Information Gathering...Company rules and regulations; administrative procedures; benefits; resource person from personnel describing each; follow up discussions.

(7) Human Relations...How the employer sees the employee/ how the employee sees the employer -- discussion with trainees and management level person sharing ideas and attitudes.

(8) Human Relations: Attitude. Discussion of its effect on work groups; dealing with feelings.

(9) Decision Making...Skills; personal skills; job skills; How skills are developed (exercises); risk taking; confidence; achievement. Personal Assesment.

(10) Communication Skills...Listening and following directions (exercise); how to say things in an effective way; giving information.

(11) Human Relations: Problem Solving...Dealing with on the job problems (case studies)

(12) Problem Solving...Dealing with off the job problems (finances, legal problems, family life -- information and discussion)

(13) Safety...Resource person describing plant procedures and hazards; reading exercises.

(14) Group Decision Making...Personal assement and feeback, planning.

In addition, agenda raised by the group as relevant to their job or personal life will be dealt with.

COUNSELLING

Periodic, scheduled sessions are being held with individual trainees to help them evaluate their progress, resolve problems, and formulate realistic plans for the future.

RE: KRAFT PROJECT - APRIL STATUS

STATISTICS

During the month of April, nine (9) more trainees qualified by completing the required number of hours -- three (3) in Rome and six (6) in Macon.

This brings us to a total of 37 qualified trainees -- 18 in Rome and 19 in Macon.

Rome Center	Number	Percent of Eligible
1. Qualified.....	18	28%
2. Enrolled.....	17	26%
3. Eligible but not attending....	29	46%

An analysis of those not attending (based on follow-up and talks with individuals) indicates that:

1 person isn't attending because he thinks he's too old.

15 do not feel, for various reasons, that the program would benefit them.

13 have either personal problems at home, or other jobs that prohibit their putting in the time for the program.

Macon Center	Number	Percent of Eligible
1. Qualified.....	19	36%
2. Enrolled.....	18	34%
3. Eligible but not attending..	15	30%

An analysis of those not attending (based on follow-up and talks with individuals) indicates that:

3 are presently disabled and unable to attend, but have put in an average of 60 hours each.

12 do not feel, for various reasons that the program would benefit them.

On several occasions, those not attending have been sent letters encouraging them to enroll. They have been personally called in and counselled by staff. And, they have been talked to by the Industrial Relations managers on several occasions. Each time these efforts are made, one or two will enroll, so we are continuing these efforts on a systematic basis.

HRD PROGRAM

A very well received HRD program has been started at both Rome and Macon. Each Wednesday afternoon, a supervisor or superintendent from one of the departments has come to the Center to participate in a group session with the trainees.

The objective of the sessions is to inform the trainees about the various departments in the plant. While many of the trainees have worked for Georgia Kraft for quite a number of years, they have only an "observer's" knowledge of the various jobs in each department.

The resource person first fills them in on the operation of the department, its role in the overall production process, and then outlines in detail the different jobs. He also brings appropriate visual aids to help clarify what he is talking about.

Trainee attendance at these sessions, has, on the average, been the best for any single group of classes.

Speakers at the Rome Center

Mr. Padgett, Assistant Superintendent of the Pulp Mill

Mr. Al Shepherd, Supervisor in Finishing and Shipping

Mr. A. P. Simpson, Supervisor in the Power House

Speakers at the Macon Center

Mr. Otis Hutto, Master Mechanic

Mr. O. T. cook, Pulp Mill Superintendent

Mr. J. F. Rodgers, Paper Mill Superintendent

Nr. Jim Frady, Technical Director of the Control Lab

EVENING PROGRAM FOR NON-GEORGIA KRAFT PERSONNEL

To more effectively use the training facility and staff capability, Georgia Kraft has approved and helped to implement an evening program for non-Georgia Kraft employees. All of the participants have, at one time, applied with Georgia Kraft, but did not successfully complete the pre-employment test battery.

The objective of this program is to help the trainees gain the competence they need to meet Georgia Kraft's employment standards.

Each trainee in the program has been given the Stanford Achievement Test. Of the six trainees enrolled in Rome, five are high school graduates and one completed the eleventh grade.

Their average achievement test results are:

Math..... 7.2 grades

Language.....6.9 grades or an overall average grade achievement level of 7.0 grades.

However, these figures are deceiving. A staff member went over each test with the trainee who took it, and discovered that at least 50% of the errors made were because of carelessness or incompetence in taking the test. Things like putting the answer in the wrong place, misreading the question, etc.

Because of this, one of the programs being emphasized is how to improve test scores. The HRD program with the night enrollees has intitially dealt with familiarizing them with Georgia Kraft -- its policies, procedures and operations.

The program began on April 13, 1970 and will last for 15 weeks. Trainees attend two hours per night, three nights per week. Six trainees are presently enrolled in Rome, and 4 in Macon.

As the program progresses, we are planning to increase the enrollment to 10 at each Center.

GED PROGRAM FOR QUALIFIED TRAINEES

Those trainees who complete the required hours for qualification are still encouraged to continue their attendance at the Centers. To stimulate this, a special G.E.D. preparation program has been instituted in Rome which aims to prepare the trainees to take the Georgia General Equivalency Degree Exam and get their high school diplomas.

SEMINAR

Georgia Kraft is projecting holding a seminar for other paper industry representatives in late June or early July. Purpose of the seminar will be to discuss innovative educational procedures for adult learners.

Dear Emory:

I'm writing belatedly to inform you about something I suspect you already know: i.e., we will be doing some somewhat more intensive in-house monitoring of the Georgia Kraft project. Frank Hartmann of Mike Sviridoff's staff will be doing the monitoring for us, and I understand that he has already contacted you about the project.

Last year you monitored the project as a favor to the Foundation, and I want to thank you for your efforts in this regard. Now, with your new position and its expanded duties, with the availability of Hartmann for such monitoring work, and with the passage of the Tax Reform Act and its new, heavier monitoring responsibilities, I thought it best to have someone in-house pick up the official monitoring responsibilities and relieve you of any feelings you might have of this being an extra burden for you. Frank tells me that you intend to visit the project anyway as part of your normal work for the Council. Please, however, don't feel that you need write us a special report on your visit, though I hope you'll keep in touch with Hartmann.

Thanks for all your efforts in the past.

Sincerely yours,

Basil J. Whiting

RE: STATUS REPORT: JUNE, 1970

DATE: JUNE 30, 1970

STATISTICS

Five trainees, three men at Macon (Eddie S. Thomas, Joy O. Stephens and Henry Callaway) and two at the Rome plant (H.C. Johnson and Johnnie Pinkard) qualified by completing the program during the month of June.

Forty two trainees, twenty two at Macon and twenty at Rome, now successfully qualified since the program commenced. We estimate an additional twenty men will complete the program before September.

We are also developing a special "test preparation" course for those trainees who would like to qualify by passing the Standard Georgia-Kraft test, but do not wish to complete the required number of hours. It is hoped that this will encourage greater participation among those eligible but not yet enrolled. We plan to commence this phase in September.

EVENING PROGRAM FOR NON-GEORGIA KRAFT EMPLOYEES

Five weeks remain in the special evening program. Presently, we have seven trainees enrolled in Rome, and three in Macon on July 31,1970, and those who successfully complete it, will be eligible for employment with Georgia Kraft.

PAPER INDUSTRY SEMINAR

We have been engaged with Georgia-Kraft representatives in planning and organizing to be held at Rome, Georgia on July 8-9. The objective is to inform paper industry representatives about the Georgia Kraft Company program, American Paper Institute and Ford Foundation programs.

Attached is a copy of the seminar program.

FORD FOUNDATION MONITORING PROGRAM

As part of the Ford Foundation's program to monitor its grants, Mr. Frank Hartman visited the project on June 22-23, 1970.

HRD PROGRAM

The Wednesday HRD session continues to draw interest from the trainees. Last Wednesday, June 24th, 13 trainees attended a session dealing with "rumors." Objective of this session was to help examine their sources of information, and how the information they receive affects the decisions they make and the attitudes they form about things.

RE: STATUS REPORT: MAY 1970

DATE: MAY 30, 1970

STATISTICS

No trainees completed their program for qualification during the month of May. Although some trainees were eligible, a combination of overtime work and "Spring planning" interferred with their attendance and qualification.

Thirty-seven trainees have qualified since the program began.

It is projected that 10 trainees will become qualified during June. All are within 24 hours of completion.

UPGRADING

In Rome, six trainees who are attending, or who have completed the U.S. R&D Training Program have thus far been upgraded into jobs formerly closed to them:

a-One (1) has transferred to the Pulp Mill as a Pulping Helper/Utility.

b-One (1) has been promoted to Knife Grinder in the Woodyard.

c-One (1) has transferred to Finishing and Shipping as a Car Unloader.

d-Two (2) have been promoted to Control Helper "A" in the Woodyard.

e-One (1) has transferred to Maintenance as a Millwright Helper.

In Macon, two trainees have been upgraded:

a-One (1) has transferred to the Pulp Mill as an Attendant.

b-One (1) has transferred to Maintenance as a Millwright Helper.

RECRUITMENT

Recruitment goes on constantly to encourage those who are eligible but not attending to attend the program. During the past week in Rome, two eligibles have begun attending.

The upgrading of several members of the affected class during the past month has served as an incentive for those not yet attending. It is expected that with counseling and encouragement, many, of the eligibles will be motivated to enroll in the program. Our objective is to encourage at least half of those not presently attending to begin. (Fifteen (15) in Rome and eight (8) in Macon).

HRD PROGRAM

During the month of May, the following supervisory personnel attended the sessions at Rome and Macon:

Rome

a-Dick Hill, Technical Director of the Control Lab

b-Fred Fezette, Purchasing Agent for the Stores

Macon

a-W.N. Bowen, Superintendent of the Power House

b-J.R. Chestnut, Supervisor in Finishing & Shipping Depart.

This program continues to have high interest and attendance on the part of the trainees.

SPECIAL EVENING PROGRAM

Nine have been enrolled in the special evening program at Rome (for non-Georgia Kraft employees); eight are still attending. One trainee terminated because he was unable to maintain his present job and attend the program.

Five have been enrolled in the Macon Center. Three are presently attending. One terminated because of a part-time job he had at night; the other because he could not afford to attend the program.

With this group, special materials in physics and improving test scores are used. There is also a heavy concentration on math and language skills. The ojbective is to prepare them to successfully meet Georgia Kraft Qualification Standards.

The program is presently in the 7th week, and will be completed on July 31, 1970.

OEO PROGRAM

Of the trainees who have previously qualified, five are continuing to work on a special GED program in Rome, and four have begun the same program at Macon.

SEMINAR

A seminar will be held July 8 - 9, 1970, for approximately 30 persons associated with the paper industry. Topic of the seminar will be: INNOVATIVE ADULT EDUCATION. The objective will be to inform the participants of the program and results thus far at Georgia Kraft as well as discuss and share ideas on how to effectively implement adult education programs in a paper mill context.

STATISTICS

Seven trainees completed the program during the month of July, five at Rome and two in Macon. This brings the total of those completing the program to fifty one (51) employees, twenty seven (27) in Macon and twenty six (26) in Rome.

AWARDS CEREMONY

Certificates have been awarded to all trainees who have qualified to date. The certificates were presented to the trainees by the respective Division Managers at awards ceremonies hold at both Rome and Macon plants.

PAPER INDUSTRY SEMINAR: JULY 8 - 9, 1970

On July 8 - 9, 1970, a seminar on Innovative Education was held at the Krannert Division of Georgia Kraft Company, Rome, Georgia.

Purpose of the seminar was to demonstrate the educational procedures being used in Georgia Kraft Company's demonstration project to up-grade laborers. The seminar also gave paper industry personnel an opportunity to share ideas and approaches presently being used throughout the paper industry to up-grade employees.

40 persons participated in the seminar:

1- 23 industrial representatives
2- 2 American Paper Institute representatives
3- 1 Ford Foundation Representative
4- 1 representative from the Southern Executive's Association.
5- 1 representative from the Wharton School of Finance & Commerce
6- 6 representatives from Georgia Kraft Company
7- 6 representatives from U.S. R&D Corporation.

SPECIAL EVENING CLASS FOR NON-GEORGIA KRAFT COMPANY EMPLOYEES

Since April 13, 1970, a special class has been conducted in the evenings from 7:00 - 9:00 P.M., three nights per week for non-Georgia Kraft Company employees.

All of the trainees had previously applied at Georgia Kraft Company for employment, but had failed to meet qualification standards based on Georgia Kraft Company employment tests.

For 15 weeks, the trainees studied math, language, principles of physics, and techniques of taking tests.

Nine trainees were initially enrolled in Rome, and five in Macon. Of the nine enrolled in Rome, six completed the program. In Macon, three completed the program.

On July 27th, those completing the program were once again given the Georgia Kraft test battery. In Rome, all six met the qualification standards and are now eligible for employment with Georgia Kraft. In Macon, two of the trainees met the qualification standards (one has not yet taken the test, but is scheduled to do so next week). We regard this as a significant record of achievement.

During their 15 weeks (90 hours of study), the trainees improved their overall average. Grade increase was 1.5 grades. The Stanford Achievement Test was used for both the pre and the post test.

PROMOTIONS

Jayson McElroy, an employee qualified via U.S. R&D training was transferred last week to the Pulp Mill at the Krannert Division in Rome, a job which was formerly closed to him.

McElroy's promotion brings to seven the number of trainees at the Krannert Division who have moved up in, or transferred to, lines of progression formerly closed to them.

TERMINATION OF PROGRAM

The U.S. R&D Training program is tentatively scheduled to end on September 25, 1970. If at that time, a sufficient number of employees (12) who have not yet qualified are regularly working on their programs to qualify, the program will be extended three months.

At present, those attending have sufficient hours to qualify by September 25th. However, there are about 30 employees in Rome, and 20 in Macon who are eligible for the training, but who are not attending the program. Every effort will be made to get them started.

PROGRAM EVALUATION

Dr. Joe Rich from Rutgers University examined the program's contents and results for The American Paper Institute on August 19 and 20.

In addition to the above, our project director and the coordinator for the Georgia Kraft Company are preparing a report on all phases of the program. The report is projected for completion in late September or early October.

STATUS OF PROGRAM COMPLETION

The program is scheduled to end on September 25. The Macon Center will close at that time. Twelve trainees have signed up to attend the Rome Center, which will stay open until December 18th if the 12 trainees attend regularly during that time.

The trainees involved in the extension are those who for one and a half years have generally ignored the program. However, having seen a number of the qualified trainees advance into lines of progression, this group has apparently decided to take advantage of it while they can. They tend to be older and academically less advanced than those who took early advantage of the program. We will utilize special methods for non-readers where applicable.

MACON CENTER CLOSES

The U.S. R&D Center at Macon has closed as of September 25, 1970 (the ending date of the Ford/ A.P.I. contract). As of that date, 30 of the 53 eligible employees had met the requirements for qualification. (Actually only 49 of the 53 were able to participate as four of the employees are out on disability, and have been for most of the program.) This is 60% of those eligible.

Efforts were made by U.S. R&D staff and Georgia Kraft personnel to extend the program in Macon for 12 more weeks to enable more of the group to qualify. It was felt that at least 9 employees would have to participate full time to justify the extension. However, only a couple showed any interest. So the program was terminated at the end of the contract.

EXTENSION OF THE ROME PROJECT

The project in Rome has been extended until December 18, 1970. At present, 26 of the eligible 64 employees have qualified through the program. 17 new trainees have enrolled, and are actively attending classes. It is anticipated that at least 15 of the group will participate actively enough to qualify by December 18th.

TRAINEES QUALIFYING

During September, one trainee at the Macon Center qualified.

erence to recognized mortality tables, and to provide death benefits which do not exceed the larger of the reserve or the total premiums paid for the annuity benefits. The insurance company is not relieved of this obligation even if the premium is not received because of a breach of the custodian's obligation under the custodial agreement or because of a loss in the annuitant's account, other than a loss from the depreciation in the investment value.

Accordingly, payments made to the bank under the instant arrangement are contributions to purchase an annuity contract, within the meaning of section 403(b)(1)(A) of the Code, if all the other requirements of section 403(b) are met.

The result in this case would have been the same if, instead of making payments to a bank custodian, the employer had made the payments directly to the insurance company and the company had placed the payments in a separate account used for investments generally.

An organization will not jeopardize its exemption under section 501(c)(3) of the Code, even though it distributes funds to nonexempt organizations, provided it retains control and discretion over use of the funds for section 501(c)(3) purposes.

SECTION 501.—EXEMPTION FROM TAX ON CORPORATIONS, CERTAIN TRUSTS, ETC.

26 CFR 1.501(c)(3)-1: Organizations organized and operated for religious, charitable, scientific, testing for public safety, literary, or educational purposes or for prevention of cruelty to children or animals. — Rev. Rul. 68-489

An organization exempt from Federal income tax under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 distributed part of its funds to organizations not themselves exempt under that provision. The exempt organization ensured use of the funds for section 501(c)(3) purposes by limiting distributions to specific projects that are in furtherance of its own exempt purposes. It retains control and discretion as to the use of the funds and maintains records establishing that the funds were used for section 501(c)(3) purposes. Held, the distributions did not jeopardize the organization's exemption under section 501(c)(3) of the Code.

See also Revenue Ruling 67-149, C.B. 1967-1, 133, holding a charitable organization exempt under section 501(c)(3) where it provides financial assistance to other charitable organizations that are also exempt under section 501(c)(3); and Revenue Ruling 63-252, C.B. 1963-2, 101, and Revenue Ruling 66-79, C.B. 1966-1, 48, for requirements with respect to deductibility under section 170 of the Code of contributions by individuals to a charity organized in the United States that thereafter transmits some or all of its funds to a foreign charitable organization.

Principal Plants in Five-State Area

Sylva, Jackson County, North Carolina
Paul C. Ellis, Division Manager; Martin Hook, Production Manager

The Sylva mill produces 295 tons per day of paperboard for corrugating. Its semi-chemical pulp mill produces 270 tons per day of pulp. It is now in the process of converting to an ammonia based system in its pulp mill. This project, which will cost $2.5 million, is scheduled for completion sometime in 1968.

Kingsport, Sullivan County, Tennessee
V.K. Shannon, Division Manager; J.R. Taggert, Assistant Division Manager; C.N. Spencer, Production Manager; J.F. Smith, Superintendent of Pulp Mill

This mill produces 525 tons per day of paper, and its pulp mill produces 260 tons per day of pulp. In 1966 Mead boosted its writing and printing paper capacity by 15 per cent with the start up of a new high-speed paper machine. This machine is the first in the world to have computor controls included in its original design. The crews for the new machine spent three months in class sessions and on-site training. At startup most of the pulp will come from pulp facilities at Kingsport and also from Mead's Brunswick Pulp and Paper Company affiliate.

Harriman, Roane County, Tennessee
H.E. Wehr, Division Manager; W.J. Palmer, Paper Mill Superintendent; Walter Hartmann, Pulp Mill Superintendent; Marvin Jones, Personnel Director

This mill produces 190 tons per day of paperboard for corrugating. Its pulp mill has a capacity of 190 tons per day. In 1966 the mill completed the modernization of its paper machine.

Knoxville, Knox County, Tennessee
S.V. Minskey, Jr., Division Manager; C.R. Voiles, General Superintendent; James W. Adams, Board Mill Superintendent

The Southern Extract Company division of Mead produces 140 tons per day of paperboard for corrugating. Its pulp mill produces 140 tons per day.

This mill, which has 1,034 employees produces 1,120 tons per day of paperboard. The pulp mill has a capacity of 1,120 tons per day. The company owns 363,636 acres of woodlands in Georgia. In 1966 Brunswick Port Authority approved an $8 million industrial revenue bond issue to finance a plant manufacturing chlorine, canstic, soda, sodium chlorate and other products. This project is scheduled for completion sometime in 1969.

The headquarters of Georgia Kraft Company is in Rome. In 1967 the company constructed a 13,000 square foot research center adjacent to the present corporate offices. The paper mill produces 1,400 tons per day of kraft liner board and corrugating medium. The pulp mill has a capacity of 1,400 tons per day.

Other Plants

The Mead Corporation has container plants at Atlanta and Macon, Georgia, Durham, North Carolina, Memphis, Tennessee ~~and~~ Durham, North Carolina, ~~and~~ Spartanburg, South Carolina. It has a packaging plant in Atlanta, Georgia. Mead expanded its Macon plant in 1966 to provide for the manufacture of large, specially coated, collapsible paperboard drums. In 1967 it completed expansion of its Spartanburg plant. This expansion doubled the size of the plant and included additional equipment for manufacturing and printing corrugated shipping containers.

CHAPTER 4

Paper and Board

Growth Should Resume In 1968

Following a pause in 1967, consumption of paper and board should advance 3 percent in 1968 to reach 53.5 million short tons. Domestic production will follow a similar pattern, increasing 4 percent to about 48.5 million tons in 1968. Between 1966 and 1967, the paper industry was affected by the slow-down in general economic activity, causing a 2-percent decline in consumption and a 1-percent dip in U.S. production.

As a result of the decline in the industry and continued U.S. population gains, per capita consumption of paper and board was off 3 percent to 522 pounds in 1967, the first such decline since 1960. In 1968, with most economic indicators pointing up, consumption of about 532 pounds per capita is expected, almost equal to the 1966 average. The United States is still by far the world leader in paper and board usage. Canada is in second position with 363 pounds per capita, and the world average is only 69 pounds per person.

Value of shipments by the industry is expected to rise to $8.5 billion in 1968, 5 percent above 1967, following a 1966–67 gain of 1 percent.

U.S. exports of paper and board (which have doubled in volume during the past 5 years), advanced 13 percent in 1967 over 1966 and should rise another 10 percent in 1968, reaching 2,240,000 tons, equal to nearly 5 percent of U.S. production. Exports consist primarily of linerboard and kraft paper to Europe and Latin America. Imports, chiefly newsprint produced in Canada by United States and Canadian firms, were down 4 percent in 1967. Although imports are expected to advance 1 percent in 1968 to 7,240,000 short tons they still would be under the 1966 peak of 7,481,000 tons.

The manufacture of paper, paperboard, and building paper and board is the processing of raw materials, including woodpulp, paper stock (wastepaper), and chemical additives into products which may then be converted by separate operations into thousands of paper and board products for industry and for individual consumers.

Paper, board, and products are an integral part of our defense commitment in Southeast Asia. Increasing Department of Defense expenditures have been clearly felt in products associated with automatic data processing and packaging for overseas shipment.

Changes in the U.S. consumption of paper and paperboard usually are closely related to the growth in disposable personal income. The year 1967 appears to have been an exception, however, since DPI has continued to advance while paper and board consumption has taken a temporary dip.

Contributing factors to this situation include: an inventory buildup of paper and paper products

1967 Profile

Paper and board manufacturing	SIC 2621 (papermills), 2631 (paperboard mills), and 2661 (building paper and board mills).
Number of companies (1963)	365.
Number of establishments (1966)	783.
Employment	290,000 [1] (includes pulpmills).
Main producing areas	South, Northeast, Lake States, and Pacific States.
Chief products	Printing paper, coarse paper, sanitary tissue stock, fine paper, newsprint, special industrial paper, container board, boxboard, special food board, construction paper and board.
Shipments (value in millions)	$8,000.[1]
Production (quantity in thousand short tons)	46,700.[1]
Exports (value in millions)	$400.[1]
Imports (value in millions)	$850.[1]
Apparent consumption (quantity in thousand short tons)	51,860.[1]
Per capita consumption (quantity in pounds)	525.[1]
Major industry problems	Rising manufacturing and distribution costs; shortages of skilled personnel; excess world pulpmaking capacity; adjusting to varying community social needs.

[1] Preliminary BDSA estimate.

during 1966 and early 1967; lower levels of homebuilding in 1966 and 1967 which reduced demand for building materials; the slowdown of general economic activity in the early months of 1967 which affected the use of many grades of paper and board; lower newspaper advertising linage and the demise of some newspapers which meant lower newsprint requirements; and labor strikes in many industries, all of which caused interruptions in demand for many of the industry's products.

Prices for the industry's products have held up despite reduced demand. The wholesale price index for paper in July 1967, at 110.9 (1957–59=100), was 2.5 percent above the year-earlier level. Paperboard, meanwhile was up 0.1 percent to 105.4, while building paper and board was off 1.5 percent to 91.5. The wholesale price index for the most part reflects list prices and therefore is not necessarily a measure of actual market prices, which may include discounts or other variations from list prices. It is, however, valuable as a trend indicator.

Industry Consumes Many Materials

In terms of tonnage used, woodpulp is the chief raw material in paper and board manufacture. In 1966, the industry consumed about 32 million short tons of woodpulp which had been produced in affiliated pulpmills, plus an additional 4 million tons of purchased woodpulp. Approximately 11 million tons of wastepaper and other fibrous materials also were consumed in the industry. Compared with 1958, consumption of woodpulp increased 62 percent while usage of the other fibrous materials was up 16 percent.

The industry is a significant consumer of many chemicals (sulfur, chlorine, sodium hydroxide, sodium sulfate, titanium dioxide, aluminum sulfate, rosin sizes, and lime) and other nonfibrous materials, including starch, clay, asbestos, and asphalt. While these products cost some $360 million a year, the industry uses fibrous materials worth about $1.6 billion, and all other materials, parts, and supplies valued at about $860 million annually.

Although it is a major consumer of water, the paper industry has done much to conserve this valuable natural resource, as evidenced by trends in water usage and paper and board output. Between 1959 and 1964, for example, water intake by the industry rose 8 percent to total 1,746 billion gallons, while paper and board production gained 23 percent. Conservation efforts by the industry also are indicated by the fact that gross water usage, including recirculation or reuse, was nearly three times the amount of water intake in 1964. A breakdown of 1964 water intake shows 63 percent used for the manufacturing process, 23 percent for steam-electric power generation, 9 percent for other cooling and condensing purposes, and 5 percent for boiler feed, sanitary service, and other uses.

Capacity Outpaces Production

Because of enlarged plant capacity generated during the capital spending boom in recent years, the ratios of production to capacity during 1967 for both paper and paperboard mills[1] showed sharper declines from year-ago levels than was indicated by changes in production volume.

The operating rate for papermills, according to industry sources, averaged 92 percent of capacity during the first 10 months of 1967, compared with 97 percent in the corresponding 1966 period, 95 percent in 1965, and 93 percent in 1964. For paperboard mills, production averaged 88 percent of capacity in the January–October period of 1967, compared with 93 percent in 1966, 90 percent in 1965, and 88 percent in 1964. Production of paper in 1967, meanwhile, was estimated to be 1 percent above 1966, while paperboard was down 1 percent. Production for the combined industries averaged 86 percent of capacity between 1958 and 1964.

The total capacity of the paper and paperboard industry is expected to expand further in 1968. The increase will amount to about 80 percent of the 1966–67 gain. New installations and improvements to existing equipment were scheduled to increase capacity by 3.5 million tons in 1967, raising the yearend capacity of the industry to 54 million tons. For 1968, planned additions total 2.8 million tons, which will raise total productive capability to 56.8 million tons. In both years, most of the new capacity is for production of corrugating materials, kraft linerboard, newsprint, and printing papers.

Rated worldwide production capacity for paper and paperboard has grown from 91 million short tons in 1960 to 132.5 million tons in 1967, a rise of 46 percent. In contrast, U.S. capacity grew 31 percent during the 1960–67 period, or from 41.3 to 54 million tons. U.S. capacity now equals 41 percent of the world total versus 45 percent in 1960.

Industry Is Broad-Based

Rather than being concentrated among a few companies, production of paper and board comes from many sources, with the largest company in the industry accounting for only 11 percent of total output. Papermills are operated by 186 different companies, and paperboard mills by 146 firms. About 26 percent of the total value of paper and board shipments come from the four largest companies, 42 percent from the eight largest, 65 percent from the 20 largest, and 87 percent from the 50 largest companies. Some 33 companies operate building paper and board mills, with 47 percent of the value of shipments represented by the four largest companies, 68 percent by the eight largest, and 97 percent by the 20 largest.

The larger companies in the paper and board industry are widely diversified—vertically, horizontally, and geographically. One large company for example, with annual sales well in excess of a half-billion dollars owns or controls nearly 4 million acres of timberland; operates 16 pulp, paper, and board mills; 12 bag plants, 26 container mills, 10 folding carton plants, 10 flexible packaging plants, and 20 other converting plants, plus sawmills, plywood, and other wood products mills, and four chemical plants.

These properties are distributed in more than half the States from Maine to Hawaii. The smaller, one- or two-machine companies, in contrast, are likely to specialize in one line, such as boxboard or printing paper, with all of their facilities confined to a single site.

Variations in the production of major types and grades of paper and board, and their proportion of total output, are shown in the table titled, "Changes in Production of Paper and Board 1958–66."

Fifteen Southern States accounted for the largest regional share of paper and board production in 1966 with 44 percent of the total, compared with 39 percent in 1958. The northeastern region (nine States) and the north-central region (10 States) each had 21 percent of the 1966 output, down from 25 and 24 percent, respectively, in 1958. Ten Western States provided the remaining 14 percent in 1966 versus 12 percent in 1958. Nearly 70 percent of the 1966 production came from the following 14 States (with their shares of the national output): Georgia (7 percent); Wisconsin (6 percent); Louisiana, Washington, Michigan, Florida, Maine, Alabama, Pennsylvania, and New York (5 percent each); Oregon, Ohio, Virginia and South Carolina (4 percent each).

Employees More Efficient, Better Paid

Increased efficiency of paper and board manufacture is reflected in the reduction in man-hours used per unit of output. In 1958, an average of 12.1 man-hours was required to produce a ton of paper; by 1965 this requirement was reduced to only 8.6 man-hours—a drop of 29 percent. The total number of man-hours worked has remained relatively steady (380 million man-hours in 1965 versus 371 million in 1958), while total industry employment has remained in the 265,000–285,000 range. During 1966, each of the 215,000 production workers produced an average of 219 tons of paper and board, 55 percent better than the average of 141 tons per worker in 1958. Industry payrolls rose 31 percent from 1958 to total $1.5 billion in 1965.

The paper industry pays high wages to attract and retain the highly skilled workers needed to operate its mills. Production workers in pulp and paper mills earned an average of $3.02 per hour in 1966. Those in paperboard mills earned $3.06. These compare with hourly earnings of $2.25 and $2.27 in 1958. Average hourly earnings in the pulp, paper, and board industry now are nearly 25 percent higher than the average for all nondurable industries and about 12 percent above the rate for all manufacturing industries. Hourly earnings in the industry rose even higher in 1967. Wage settlements resulting from the labor negotiations during 1967 presage still higher earnings in 1968.

Spending Heavy for New Plant

The paper and allied products industry in 1967 continued spending on new plant and equipment at a faster rate than that for all manufacturing industries. Following the 1963–66 period, when domestic outlays by the paper industry more than doubled from $720 million to $1.5 billion, a further gain of 7 percent to $1.6 billion is estimated for 1967. Expenditures for new papermaking facilities now equal 5.9 percent of the spending by all manufacturers compared with 4.6 percent in 1963.

Foreign capital outlays by U.S. producers of paper and allied products have also more than doubled in recent years. Expenditures abroad reached nearly $300 million in 1967 versus $134 million in 1963. During this period, overseas spending by U.S. paper companies ranged between 15 and 18 percent of total capital expenditures. Three-fourths of the foreign spending since 1960 has been in Canada, 10 percent in Europe, 7 percent in Latin America, and the remaining 8 percent has occurred in other areas of the world.

The emphasis given to plant modernization and expansion has strengthened the U.S. paper industry's competitive position in both domestic and international markets. At the same time the industry stands ready to take advantage of future opportunities stemming from a rising worldwide demand for paper and paperboard products.

Merger Activity Still Lively

Merger activity in the paper industry declined somewhat from earlier years, but still continued at a good pace in 1966 and 1967. Through mergers, firms sought increased profitability, growth, and efficiency by improving their competitive positions in terms of raw materials, manufacturing facilities, research efforts, and marketing patterns. Companies in the paper and allied products industry (SIC 26) acquired 21 firms in 1966, according to the Federal Trade Commission. This compared with 27 in 1965, 14 in 1964, and an annual average of 31 during the 1955–59 period. The peak year for merger activity in the paper industry was 1960, when 52 mergers were consummated. Paper industry mergers in 1966 represented 2.5 percent of mergers by all manufacturing concerns compared with an average proportion of 5.4 percent in 1955–59.

During the first three quarters of 1967, news accounts indicated that nine mergers were completed in the paper industry. By the end of the period, at least a dozen additional mergers were in various stages of negotiation. Three other proposed mergers were canceled before completion during this 9-month period, and one company was ordered to divest itself of a distribution subsidiary acquired in 1961.

More Spending on Research

Spending on research and development by the paper and allied products industry rose 11 percent over 1965 and 50 percent over 1960 to reach $84 million in 1966. Research expenditures are expected to gain an additional 20 percent to $101 million in 1969. While the paper industry allocates proportionately less of the sales dollar to R. & D. (0.4 percent in 1966) than the average for all industry (2.9 percent), it benefits substantially from the research activities of the U.S. Forest Products Laboratory and other public programs.

The industry's activities in research and technological development embrace a wide area from land utilization through papermaking techniques to market analyses. Scientists and engineers are striving for higher and more efficient yield of fiber per acre of timberland through improved genetics, better forest management, the use of tree fertilization, and the mechanization and development of new equipment and processes for harvesting and handling wood.

New sources of nonwood fiber and improvements in reclaimed fiber are being pursued. Faster and wider paper machines under fully automated process control are being developed and installed. Waste disposal, odor control, water pollution abatement, handling systems, and drying techniques are among the problem areas to which the industry is devoting its efforts. Results of R. & D. activities and technological improvements quickly become common knowledge through discussion at meetings of professional organizations and publication in trade journals.

Disposables Generate Interest

Although not new products, disposables made of cellulose reinforced with natural or synthetic fibers have received increasing attention in recent years. The disposable products cover a wide range from aprons, blankets, and capes, through draperies, dresses, and gowns, to pants, pillowcases, sheets, swimsuits, towels, and wiping cloths.

The paper industry provides much of the basic material for these products. The products themselves are generally made and distributed by clothing manufacturers, hospital supply firms, or other types of businesses. An estimated $10 million of the nonwoven materials were sold in 1966. Demand was so strong in 1967 that the few paper companies supplying this market were selling the materials as fast as they could be produced. Even so, they still had substantial order backlogs.

Paper and board exports have been gaining at an annual rate of at least 10 percent since 1964, after having doubled in volume during the preceding 8 years. Exports in 1968 are projected to rise another 10 percent reaching 2,240,000 tons valued at $440 million. Exports are now equivalent to 4 percent of total U.S. production, compared with 2 percent in 1958.

Kraft paper and paperboard continue to be the major export grades. The United States, with its abundant fiber resources, is the principal shipper of kraft linerboard to the world. Principal markets for kraft linerboard in 1966 were the United Kingdom, West Germany, Ecuador, Italy, Honduras, Panama, and the Netherlands. Kraft wrapping and bag paper, and other types of kraft paper and board, went mainly to Canada, the Philippines, United Kingdom, Costa Rica, Panama, West Germany, Australia, Mexico, and Honduras. Many of these countries also were significant markets for other grades of paper and board exported.

Newsprint, 95 percent of which comes from Canada, constitutes more than 90 percent of United States imports of paper and board. Much of the imported Canadian newsprint is produced by subsidiaries of U.S. paper and publishing companies. Imports of newsprint from Finland have more than doubled in the 1960's but still equal only 4 percent of all imports. Mainly because of increased domestic newsprint production and a dip in U.S. newsprint consumption in 1967, imports of paper and board are expected to be down 4 percent from 1966. In 1968, however, imports are projected to increase a moderate 1 percent to 7,240,000 short tons, valued at $860 million.

The results of the Kennedy Round of tariff negotiations are considered to be relatively successful for U.S. paper and board interests. International economic relations among free world nations will be improved, trade will be stimulated, and U.S. exports of paper and board should gain faster than imports.

For corporations in the paper and allied products industry, profits after taxes declined to 4.8 percent of sales in the first half of 1967, compared with 5.4 percent during 1966. However, the 1967 profit rate is on a par with the years 1961–63 and 1965 when profits averaged between 4.5 and 5 percent of sales. Based on trends in the first half, it is likely that corporate sales totaled about $16.8 billion for the full year 1967, down 1 percent from 1966, while aftertax profits of $800 million would be off 12 percent. These declines reflect the lower rates of industry operations in relation to expanded plant capacity during 1967.

The paper industry experienced a more severe pinch in 1967 sales and profits than all manufactures. Net sales by all manufacturing corporations (except newspapers) in the first half of 1967 at $282 billion were 4 percent above the similar 1966 period, but net profits after taxes were off 8 percent to $14.3 billion. The profit-to-sales ratio for January–June 1967 of 5.1 percent also was below the 5.8-percent rate for last year.

During 1966, the paper and allied products industry recorded a corporate net profit rate of 10.5 percent on net worth, the third successive annual increase. Although this ratio declined in the first two quarters of 1967, it still compared favorably with the 1964 and 1965 levels.

Financial ratios for 26 of the larger companies which manufacture, convert, and distribute a variety of paper and other forest products have for many years shown a close relationship between sales and total assets. Also significant is the high proportion of annual capital expenditures to gross plant, which rose steadily from 1963 to a 1966 peak, along with a declining ratio of depreciation to plant. Both are indicative of the huge plant expansion and modernization program throughout the industry. That large borrowings were required to finance the capital spending boom is evident from the sharp drop in the ratio of net worth to debt among these firms between 1964 and 1967.—Charles L. Smith, Forest Products Division.

Dear Chuck:

It was good to meet you in Lexington and to learn more about the plans for the Labor Education Centers.

I trust that the Owensboro class will go well and I look forward to teaching with the group there.

Please give my regards to Bill. I forgot to suggest to him that it would be useful to have some sort of folder with five or six blank sheets for each student as a notebook. They could add my mimeographed handouts to their notes.

Enclosed is a statement of my travel expenses and accompanying receipts.

Yours truly,

Dear Bill:

Enclosed is a copy of the temporary class roll. The check marks indicate those who also attended the second session. Please note the spelling corrections on some names. Also note that Mrs. Mary Frakes attended both the first and second sessions. The six persons you showed as possible drop-outs all attended both the first and second sessions. The problem seems to be that their registration fees were not paid. They now think, in most cases, this has been sent to you. You may wish to double-check on that.

I think it very important to send a card reminding all class members of the date of the next session. The announcement about missing October 31 was made quite clearly and I think it will be important for a reminder notice to go to the class members during the week in which November 7th falls.

Both classes seem to go very well.

Sincerely,

Emory F. Via, Director

Dear Mr. Via:

Enclosed is a check covering the expenses of your initial visit to Owensboro on September 29.

Last week I attended the state convention of the Kentucky AFL-CIO in Louisville. Several of the class members of the Owensboro courses were there, and all were very enthusiastic about the progress of the classes. The leaders are making plans now to continue with the courses during the spring, and hope to have a course in communications, public speaking, etc.

Mr. Henry Lake has undertaken the responsibility for handling the enrollment of Mrs. Frakes. I hope it will be managed in a diplomatic way.

Again, let me say that we greatly appreciate your assistance in our inaugural program.

Sincerely,

Dear Mrs. Bondurant:

Thank you for your note of October 15. I am sorry to be so slow in responding but I had some difficulty in locating a suitable photograph. It is enclosed.

You probably do not need any further information on me for your purposes but just in case, let me recite the following: I was born in 1925 in Virginia; my BA Degree is from Emory University, Atlanta, Georgia and my Ph.D. in Political Science is from the University of Chicago; I was formerly professor of Labor Education, School for Workers, The University of Wisconsin; and currently I am the Director of Labor Program, Southern Regional Council, Inc. My associational memberships include the American Political Science Association; the Industrial Relations Research Association and Local 189 of the American Federation of Teachers.

I trust this will be sufficient.

I was sorry to hear during our last class session that you had been ill. I trust you are well at this time. It was an interesting group and I enjoyed the opportunity to get to know them. I felt that basically the class went quite well and I trust your new Labor Education program will continue to move ahead.

If the final ceremony of awarding certificates has not already taken place, I would like to send a letter of congratulation to the class. Could you let me know when that affair will be held?

Dear Dr. Via:

Enclosed is a check in compensation for your work at Owensboro, Kentucky, last fall. With it comes our deepest appreciation for the effort you have put forth to assist us in initiating a program of Labor Education offered by extension throughout our state. I had hoped we could borrow you again several times but I know this to be impossible.

It may interest you to know that we have organized a class in Ashland, Kentucky, one begins in Lexington on the 25th of February, and a program will be going in Louisville on the 12th of March. Of course, there will be a continuation of the program you started in Owensboro this spring.

HOW A BILL BECOMES LAW IN WISCONSIN

William O. Kuhl

1. INTRODUCTION (Assembly or Senate)	1. A bill may be introduced by a member of the legislature or a legislative committee during the order of business, "Introduction of Bills."
2. "REFERRED TO REVISION"	2. Every bill introduced in the Assembly, not the Senate, is first "Referred to Revision" where it is examined by clerks of the legislature to see that it conforms with legislative rules.
3. 1st READING STAGE	3. Upon securing "revisions" approval in the Assembly or upon introduction in the Senate a bill is sent to the desk of the presiding officer of the house (Lieutenant Governor in the Senate and Speaker in the Assembly). When the house is next in session, usually the next legislative day, the title of the bill is read by the chief clerk and it is given a number. The bill is now technically introduced. 1000 copies are printed of every bill introduced. Copies may be obtained at the documents room which each house of the legislature maintains.
4. REFERRED TO COMMITTEE	4. The presiding officer of the house refers each bill to the appropriate house committee. There are 6 standing legislative committees in the Senate (Agriculture and Conservation, Education and Public Welfare, Highways, Judiciary, Labor and Banking, Governmental and Veterans' Affairs); 16 in the Assembly (Agriculture, Commerce and Manufacturers, Conservation, Education, Elections, Excise and Fees, Highways, Insurance and Banking, Judiciary, Labor Municipalities, Public Welfare, State Affairs, Taxation, Transportation, Veterans' and Military Affairs); 1 joint committee (Finance).

5. COMMITTEE HEARING

5. The practice prevails in the Wisconsin legislature of holding public hearings on all bills referred to committee. Committee hearings are held in the afternoon usually beginning at 2:00. The date of a bill's hearing is set by the chairman of the committee. Each house publishes a "Weekly Bulletin of Committee Hearings," which appears on Friday, which lists all hearings that will be held before committees during the next week. This bulletin may be obtained at the document rooms of the two houses. On the day of the hearing bills are called in turn as scheduled, and an opportunity is given to any citizen who is present to express his views, either for or against the bill.

6. COMMITTEE REPORT

6. After the public hearing, either on the same day or at some later date, the committee considers the bill in executive (closed) session and decides upon its recommendation to the house. Each bill must be reported out of committee with a recommendation. In Wisconsin no bill can die in committee. The committee may recommend the bill for passage with or without submitted amendments, or may recommend it for indefinite postponement.

When the committee has formulated its recommendation, its chairman on the next day reports it to the house. This report states merely the committee's recommendation and gives no reason for it.

7. SCHEDULED FOR HOUSE ACTION	7. Upon the filing of the committee's report the bill, with or without committee amendments, is placed on the calendar of the house for the second legislative day after the filing of the report, under the order of business, "Bills Ready for Engrossment."
8. 2nd READING STAGE	8. When the order of business, "Bills Ready for Engrossment," is reached, the several bills listed are taken up in order. This is the first stage at which the house, as a whole, considers the bill. It is now open to amendment and this is the only time (except by suspension of the rules) that individual members can offer amendments or that amendments are considered. The bill and all amendments thereto are open to debate, after which a vote is taken on each amendment in turn and then a vote on the bill itself. The bill may be laid over to some other day, indefinitely postponed which finally kills the bill unless the house should reverse its actions on reconsideration of the vote, recommitted to the committee which reported on it, referred to an entirely different committee, or ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.
9. ENGROSSMENT	9. If the bill is approved by the house, it is ordered to be engrossed. Engrossment is the process of retyping the bill, if amendments were adopted, with the amendments being inserted in their proper place. If no amendments were adopted, the original bill is treated as the engrossed bill.

"Bills involving appropriations or expenditures are sent, ordinarily after engrossment, to the Joint Committee on Finance. This committee will usually conduct a hearing on the financial aspects only of the bill, and will make recommendations when it returns the bill to the originating house. Upon being returned the bill may then be debated and amended again on the floor of the legislative house. If action is favorable, the bill will then be re-engrossed for a final vote."

10. SCHEDULED FOR FINAL HOUSE ACTION	10. After engrossment, a bill is placed on the calendar under the order of business, "Bills Ready for Third Reading," and usually comes up for final debate and vote on the second legislative day after the house has ordered it to engrossment.
11. 3rd READING STAGE	11. When the order of business, "Bills Ready for Third Reading," is reached, the bill can again be debated but it is not open to further amendment. The house at this stage must either pass the bill or indefinitely postpone it. After a bill has been passed, it may still be reconsidered, if a motion for reconsideration of the vote by which passed is filed not later than the next legislative day.
12. TRANSMITTAL TO OTHER HOUSE	12. A bill which has been passed is usually transmitted to the other house for concurrence on the second legislative day after passage. The transmittal is in the form of a message from the chief clerk of the house of passage indicating that it has passed Bill No. __ and asking concurrence therein.

13. 1st READING STAGE (SECOND HOUSE)	13. The clerk's transmittal message asking concurrence is read in the second house.
14. REFERRED TO COMMITTEE	14. The bill is usually referred by the presiding officer of the second house to one of its standing legislative committees.
15. COMMITTEE HEARING	15. The committee will usually hold a public hearing on the bill unless joint hearings were held on it before.
16. COMMITTEE REPORT	16. Committee report is filed for action.
17. 2nd READING STAGE	17. The bill is here subject to debate and amendment by the members of the second house. The second house may kill the bill which ends it for the session or it may occur in the bill either with or without amendments.
18. 3rd READING STAGE	18. The second house takes final action on the bill.
19. TRANSMITTAL TO FIRST HOUSE	19. The action of the second house either rejection or concurrence, with or without amendments, is transmitted to the first house.
20. IF SECOND HOUSE AMENDS	20. If the second house amends the bill, its amendments must be acted upon in the first house (the house in which the measure originated). If it refuses to agree to the amendments adopted by the second house, it returns the bill to it for reconsideration. If the second house adheres to its position the bill is returned to the first (originating) house, which may ask for a committee of conference, composed of members of both houses, to work out a compromise.

No bill can become law unless both houses have approved an identical measure.

21. ENROLLMENT

21. If both houses have agreed to the bill in identical form, it is "enrolled" by the house in which it originated. Enrolling consists of retyping the bill with all amendments as agreed upon by the houses inserted in their proper place. It also includes printing the bill as passed, with the caption of "An Act" not "A Bill."

22. TRANSMITTAL TO GOVERNOR

22. One copy of the printed, enrolled bill is treated as the official copy of the bill as passed by the houses. This copy is signed in person by the presiding officers of the two houses and by the chief clerk of the house in which it originated. This official copy of the final bill is then sent by the chief clerk of the house of origin to the Governor.

23. ACTION OF GOVERNOR

23. The Governor has six days, excepting Sundays and holidays, in which to approve or disapprove of the Act. If he signs it, it becomes law after publication in the official state paper. If he vetoes it, it is returned to the house in which it originated. If both houses repass the Act by a two-thirds vote the Act becomes law without the Governor's approval.

Should the Governor, within this six day period, neither sign nor veto the Act, it becomes law without his signature unless the legislature adjourns within this period. In this latter case, the Act dies automatically unless the Governor signs it. Failure to act in this case is called a "pocket veto."

HOW BILLS BECOME LAWS
STATE OF WISCONSIN

-BY-

ARTHUR L. MAY ASSEMBLY CHIEF CLERK

HOW BILLS BECOME LAWS

Laws begin as bills and must pass both houses of the legislature and be approved by the Governor. Bills can be introduced only by members of the legislature, but relatively few bills really originate with the members. Some of the most important bills are administration measures sponsored by the Governor. Some are departmental bills originating with the state departments administering the laws to which these bills are proposed amendments. Many other bills originate with county boards and city councils. A still larger number come from organizations, such as the League of Wisconsin Municipalities, the Isaak Walton League, the State Federation of Labor, the Wisconsin Conference of Social Work, and many others. The important source of bills, however, comes from constituents of the members. Members are not required to introduce any bill, and, as they are responsible for the bills bearing their name, should, and generally do, exercise their own best judgment before introducing any bill they are asked to present. But, it should be understood that in introducing bills members are usually acting for others and the real promoters of proposed legislation are usually outside of the legislature.

In Wisconsin all bills affecting the statutes of the state are drawn as amendments to the statutes. The drafting of bills is a highly technical job requiring thorough knowledge of the constitution, statutes, and government of the state and with the rules of the legislature. Most bills are drafted by the Legislative Reference Library before they are introduced. Although members are not required to use this service, for many sessions practically every bill has at least been put into final form by the Library. The Legislative Reference Library drafts bills only upon signed instructions from members and puts into bill form the ideas they express. Often a bill passes through many different drafts before it is introduced and not until it is entirely satisfactory to the member is it released by the Library. All relations with members are confidential and no information regarding any bill can be obtained from the Legislative Reference Library until it has been actually introduced on the floor.

The introduction of a bill occurs during a session of the legislature by members presenting it during the order of business, "INTRODUCTION OF BILLS." On introduction the bill is "REFERRED TO REVISION," which means that it is given a final examination by clerks of the legislature to see that it conforms with the legislative rules. Normally the bill is reported back from revision at the next meeting of the legislature at which time it is read by title and referred by the presiding officer to the appropriate committee. Immediately after the introduction, one thousand copies are printed of each bill, of which several hundred are available for public distribution. Each house of the legislature maintains a document room, where any interested person may get a copy of any bill that has been introduced and printed.

The next stage after the introduction is the committee hearing. There are seven committees in the senate and seventeen in the assembly to which bills are referred, in addition to several procedural committees. In Wisconsin the practice prevails of giving a public hearing upon every bill or resolution referred to any committee. All hearings before committees are held in the afternoon, beginning at 2:00 o'clock P.M. Each week during the session each house of the legislature publishes a bulletin of committee hearings. This appears normally on Friday and lists all hearings which will be held before the committees during the next week. This bulletin is obtainable at the document rooms of the two houses and publicity is also given through the newspapers to the scheduled hearings on all important bills.

On the day of the hearing bills are called in turn as scheduled, and an opportunity is given to any citizen who is present to express his views, either for or against the bill. Frequently amendments are suggested at this stage, which the committees may or may not accept, as they see fit. If there are so many people who desire to be heard on a given bill that the hearing cannot be concluded in the time allowed therefor, it is continued at a later date, which is announced and scheduled like the original hearing.

After the public hearing, either on the same day or at some later date, the committee considers the bill in executive session and decides upon its recommendation to the legislature. The committee may either report a bill for indefinite postponement or for passage, with or without amendments. All votes in committee are taken by roll call and the record of the vote of each member is preserved and, after the session, filed with the secretary of state, together with all votes on the bill in the legislature itself. In Wisconsin no bill dies in committee. Committees can only recommend what action the legislature shall take on bills -- not finally dispose of them.

When the committee has decided what it will do with a bill, the chairman reports its action to the house. This is a formal report, stating merely the recommendation of the committee, without giving any reasons therefor.

After presentation of the report of the committee the bill goes on the calendar of the next legislative day, which is the second day following under the order of business "BILLS TO BE ORDERED TO THIRD READING", if it is a senate bill and to "BILLS TO BE ENGROSSED" if an assembly bill, with notation of the committee's recommendation. These calendars are made out one day in advance. This applies to the assembly. Files of all bills introduced in each house are put on desks of all members and amendments are inserted following the bills to which they relate. Members thus can familiarize themselves with all measures in advance of the session, and have these measures actually before them when they act on them.

Sessions of the legislature are held in the forenoon, the rules providing that they shall begin at 10:00 A.M., unless otherwise ordered the previous day. When there are many bills to be acted on, the sessions often begin at 9:00 A.M., and there are frequent added evening sessions. In past years, however, there have been few Saturday sessions and usually no sessions on Monday until evening, or none at all.

When a bill on the calendar of the house is reached under the order of business, "BILLS TO BE ORDERED TO A THIRD READING" or "ENGROSSMENT" (which is sometimes called "the second reading stage") it is open to debate and amendment. In addition to any amendments which the committee may have recommended, individuals may at this stage and no other, offer amendments. All amendments are acted upon in turn, unless a substitute amendment is offered, which takes the place of the entire bill -- in which case action on the bill goes over until the next calendar day. After all amendments have been disposed of, a vote is taken on the bill itself as it then stands. If this carries, the bill is said to have been "ORDERED ENGROSSED and ADVANCED TO THIRD READING," otherwise it dies then and there, unless a motion for reconsideration should be adopted.

In Wisconsin engrossing a bill means a retyping of the measure with all amendments in their proper place. Engrossed bills are not printed, but every amendment is printed separately in precisely the same way that bills are printed. Bills ordered to engrossment, if they involve appropriations or expenditures, are then referred to the Joint Committee on Finance which is the most important of all legislative committees, and is composed of members of both houses. The joint finance committee usually conducts another hearing on the finance feature of any bill referred to it, and then makes its recommendations to the house in which the bill is pending, in the same manner as do other committees. Thereafter, the bill is again subject to debate and amendment and, if it passes the gauntlet, is re-engrossed.

After engrossment, a bill is put on the calendar under the order of business "BILLS READY FOR THIRD READING," and usually comes up either on the second or third legislative day after the house has ordered it engrossed or ordered it to "THIRD READING" if it is a senate bill. At the third reading stage of the bill, there is again opportunity to debate the measure, but the bill is not then open to amendment. The house must at this stage either pass the bill or indefinitely postpone the measure.

If the bill passes, it then goes to the other house. In the other house it goes through the same procedure of committee hearing, consideration and amendment at the second reading stage, and finally of passage (only this is called "concurrence" in the other house). The second house may kill the bill, which ends it for the session, as the rules provide that no bill once killed can be revived. On the other hand, it may concur in the bill, either with or without amendments.

If the second house amends the bill, its amendments must be acted upon in the house in which the measure originated. No bill can become a law until both houses have passed the identical measure.

Even bills which have passed both houses are not finally passed so long as any amendments are in disagreement between the houses. When one house has amended the bill of another, the first house may agree to the amendment of the other house, or it may non-concur in such amendment. If it amends the amendment or non-concurs therein, the bill goes back to the second house, which then may either accept the action of the first house or refuse to do so. If it disagrees, the measure once more goes back to the first house, which then asks for a committee of conference. This is a committee composed of three members from each house who voted as did the majority of their respective houses. Its function is to try to iron out the differences between the houses, with the chances about even of doing so.

Conference committees are comparatively rare in Wisconsin, but amendments between the houses are very frequent. Nearly one-half of all bills usually die in the house in which introduced, and many more are slaughtered in the other house; a few are lost between the houses because they cannot agree on precisely the same measure. Less than forty percent of all bills become laws.

When a bill has finally passed both houses in precisely identical form, it is "enrolled" by the house in which it originated. In Wisconsin enrolling means printing the bill as an act, exactly as passed. One copy of the enrolled bill is signed by the presiding officers of the two houses and countersigned by the chief clerk of the house in which it originated and by him transmitted to the governor. The governor has six days for consideration of the bill, during which he may either sign or veto the measure. If he signs the bill, it becomes law after publication in the official state paper. If he does not act on the bill at all, it likewise becomes law unless this is at the end of the session, when his failure to act constitutes what is called a "pocket veto." If the governor vetoes the measure, it goes back to the house in which it originated and then becomes law only if repassed by a two-thirds vote of both houses.

This concludes my brief presentation of the high points of the course a bill takes in becoming a law. Now, I wish to make some general observations about lawmaking in Wisconsin, which may be of interest.

Wisconsin's legislative procedure is notable in that every bill is given a public hearing and is voted upon in at least the house in which it is introduced. Massachusetts is the only other state in which this is the case, and in this practice lies one of the principal reasons for the long sessions which have become customary in this state. This procedure has its disadvantages, but does make for more careful consideration and above-board dealing in legislation.

Unusual, also, is the Wisconsin practice of casting all bills in the form of amendments to the existing statutes, instead of as additions thereto. This enables the members and others interested in legislation to know precisely what each bill does. In Wisconsin there are no blanket repeals. Every bill sets forth precisely what provisions of the existing statutes are changed, and shows both the old material which is stricken and the new material which is added.

The electric voting machine used in the assembly is another feature in Wisconsin's legislative procedure, although this Wisconsin innovation has now been copied in a few other states. By means of this device, roll calls of the 100 members can be taken in less than a minute.

Most states have much shorter legislative sessions than has Wisconsin. This does not mean that more bills are introduced or more laws enacted than in other states, but rather that more consideration is given to bills. There are some changes which might well be made in the rules to expedite sessions, but vastly more important than speed in enacting legislation, except vitally necessary emergency measures, is careful consideration. While regular legislative sessions cost in the neighborhood of a quarter of a million dollars, this amount is small compared with the total governmental expenditures which are within the control of the legislature.

I certainly enjoyed meeting you yesterday in Baton Rouge and especially our trip to New Orleans. I hope we can be in close contact in the future and I look forward to working with you.

Would you please put my name on the mailing list of the Southern Regional Council and send me any information you might have on labor relations.

I hope to see you soon.

Dear Emory:

Please excuse me for not getting in touch with you sooner concerning the possibility of your participation in our AFT convention. Budget limitations excluded the possibility of your participation. The convention was successful but we still needed more hard data and I think your participation would have more than supplied that.

I will be in touch with you soon.

Every sincere thanks for your consideration.

Dear Dave:

Thanks for your letter. I am sorry to have missed the AFT Institute and regret that I must not have adequately communicated my position regarding expense money. I had meant to say that I felt your program was fully worthy of our participation at our own expense. However, I was asking if the AFT was able to provide expense money. If so, we would have been pleased to have been reimbursed. If not, we would have been equally delighted to have participated with you in the program.

Of course, it is impossible to respond to every invitation, but I trust that you will have no hesitation in calling on me again.

To my great disappointment I will not be coming to the NCCIJ Convention. I had told Jack that Iwould be attending only to find out that the week of the convention was the only vacation week that I would have with my family.

Best personal wishes and please let me hear from you again.

DAVID J. SAPOSS
and ELIZABETH T. BLISS[1]

The "Mohawk Valley Formula" (*)

David J. Saposs (1886-) is a labor economist associated with the Wisconsin school. Formerly economist for the National Labor Relations Board, he is now with the United States Department of Labor.

Elizabeth T. Bliss was a Junior Economist for the National Labor Relations Board.

Because the "Mohawk Valley Formula," as it is called, has played such an important role in the employers' anti-union offensive, . . . the NLRB summation is reproduced here.

"First: When a strike is threatened, label the union leaders as 'agitators' to discredit them with the public and their own followers. In the plant, conduct a forced balloting under the direction of foremen in an attempt to ascertain the strength of the union and to make possible misrepresentation of the strikers as a small minority imposing their will upon the majority. At the same time, disseminate propaganda, by means of press releases, advertisements, and the activities of 'missionaries,' such propaganda falsely stating the issues involved in the strike so that the strikers appear to be making arbitrary demands, and the real issues, such as the employer's refusal to bargain collectively, are obscured. Concurrently with these moves, by exerting economic pressure through threats to move the plant, align the influential members of the community into a cohesive group opposed to the strike. Included in this group, usually designated a 'Citizens' Committee,' are representatives of the bankers, real estate owners, and businessmen, i.e., those most sensitive to any threat of removal of the plant because of its effect upon property values and purchasing power flowing from payrolls.

"Second: When the strike is called raise high the banner of 'law and order,' thereby causing the community to mass legal and police weapons against a wholly imagined violence and to forget that those of its members who are employees have equal rights with the other members of the community.

"Third: Call a 'mass meeting' of the citizens to coordinate public sentiment against the strike and to strengthen the power of the Citizens' Committee, which organization, thus supported, will both aid the employer in exerting pressure upon the local authorities and itself sponsor vigilante activities.

"Fourth: Bring about the formation of a large armed police force to intimidate the strikers and to exert a psychological effect upon the citizens. This force is built up by utilizing local police, State Police, if the Governor cooperates, vigilantes, and special deputies, the deputies being chosen if possible from other neighborhoods, so that there will be no personal relationships to induce sympathy for the strikers. Coach the deputies and vigilantes on the law of unlawful assembly, inciting to riot, disorderly conduct, etc., so that, unhampered by any thought that the strikers may also possess some rights, they will be ready and anxious to use their newly acquired authority to the limit.

"Fifth: And perhaps most important, heighten the demoralizing effect of the above measures—all designed to convince the strikers that their cause is hopeless—by a 'back to work' movement, operated by a puppet association of so-called 'loyal employees' secretly organized by the employer. Have this association wage a publicity campaign in its own name and coordinate such campaign with the work of the 'missionaries' circulating among the strikers and visiting their homes. This 'back to work' movement has these results: It causes the public to believe that the strikers are in the minority and that most of the employees desire to return to work, thereby winning sympathy for the employer and an endorsement of his activities to such an extent that the public is willing to pay the huge costs, direct and indirect, resulting from the heavy forces of police. This 'back to work' movement also enables the employer, when the plant is later opened, to operate it with strikebreakers if necessary and to continue to refuse to bargain collectively with the strikers. In addition, the 'back to work' movement permits the employer to keep a constant check on the strength of the union through the number of applications received from employees ready to break ranks and return to work, such number being kept a secret from the public and the other employees, so that the doubts and fears created by such secrecy will in turn induce still others to make applications.

"Sixth: When a sufficient number of applications are on hand, fix a date for an opening of the plant through the device of having such opening requested by the 'back to work' association. Together with the Citizens' Committee, prepare for such opening by making provision for a peak army of police by roping off the areas surrounding the plant, by securing arms and ammunition, etc. The purpose of the 'opening' of the plant is threefold: To see if enough employees are ready to return to work; to induce still others to return as a result of the demoralizing effect produced by the opening of the plant and the return of some of their number; and, lastly, even if the maneuver fails to induce a sufficient number of persons to return, to persuade the public through pictures and news releases that the opening was nevertheless successful.

"Seventh: Stage the 'opening' theatrically, throwing open the gates at the propitious moment and having the employees march into the plant grounds in a massed group protected by squads of armed police, so as to give to the opening a dramatic and exaggerated quality and thus heighten its demoralizing effect. Along with the 'opening' provide a spectacle—speeches, flag raising, and praises for the employees, citizens, and local authorities, so that, their vanity touched, they will feel responsible for the continued success of the scheme and will increase their efforts to induce additional employees to return to work.

"Eighth: Capitalize on the demoralization of the strikers by continuing the show of police force and the pressure of the Citizens' Committee, both to insure that those employees who have returned will continue at work and to force the remaining strikers to capitulate. If necessary, turn the locality into a warlike camp through the declaration of a state of emergency tantamount to martial law and barricade it from the outside world so that nothing may interfere with the successful conclusion of the 'Formula,' thereby driving home to the union leaders the futility of further efforts to hold their ranks intact.

"Ninth: Close the publicity barrage, which day by day during the entire period has increased the demoralization worked by all of these measures, on the theme that the plant is in full operation and that the strikers were merely a minority attempting to interfere with the 'right to work,' thus inducing the public to place a moral stamp of approval upon the above measures. With this, the campaign is over—the employer has broken the strike."

What Do You Think?

Translated from KÖLNER Stadt Anzeiger - Cologne, Germany, June 28, 1960

"Longer Vacations More Important than 5-Day Work Week"

Most Efficient Working Time: 8 Hours Per Day.

Marburg, Germany (AP) - A second three-week vacation period contributes more to the maintenance of an individual's capacity to work than does switching from a six to a 5-day work week, according to a medical point of view expressed here. This also applies to students whose classes are spread over six days. This was concluded by the participants of a conference at Marburg Phillips University after a discussion on the topic, "Work Fatigue and Regeneration of the Working Man - a Current Problem."

The director of the medical clinic of Marburg University, Prof. Bock said in his final report that there was general agreement that the 8-hour day was best. A prolongation of the daily working time (beyond 8 hours) in favor of a longer week-end could not be justified, medically speaking.

It is important that the additional free time be efficiently used. Not only is leisure time important but also important is "active relaxation" by means of gardening, hiking, music, games and sports.

The internist Professor Hochrein (Ludwigshafen) said that the particular burden of the working man in the modern industrial climate leads, above all, to a spiritual and emotional exhaustion. The most frequent early symptoms of such exhaustion are a certain liability of the autonomic nervous system, dissatisfaction with one's work and a general restlessness.

Tension and relaxation ought to be balanced. A one-sided and complete relaxation would not be the answer. The so-called "death of retirement" supports that point.

As a pediatrician, Prof. Köttgen (Mainz) pointed out the dangerous consequences that shift schedules and afternoon classes (still necessary in some parts of Germany) have on the children's health. Breaks between classes are in general too short, in Dr. Köttgen's opinion.

THE BUTTONS KEEP COMING OFF

by Robert Fontaine*

I live in a mad world where the buttons keep coming off my shirts, my shoelaces keep breaking, and my neckties unravel before my eyes. Perhaps you've had a taste of this sort of thing, too. Everything you buy has to be readjusted, revitalized, and refinished, if not rejected and returned.

Even the people they turn out these days are deficient or negligent, incompetent, or lazy. I know a good carpenter who can't come this week. He may not be able to come next week, either. He doesn't know for sure. He may be fishing next week.

I wouldn't need the carpenter if the furniture we bought some time ago hadn't developed bow legs and sunken seats. The man at the furniture store said it's all coming through that way. The manufacturers sent me a nice letter. The general idea was that we aren't getting the kind of trees we used to, and so the lumber is faulty.

A friend of mine bought a new compact car to save money on gasoline. The car has a gasoline heater that used more fuel than the car does. They're all coming through that way, the dealer says. Any time you buy a new model, the dealer explains, it has bugs in it. By the time they have a chance to straighten out the bugs, a still newer model is on the lines. Our industry is so efficient, so beautifully automated, so streamlined that when you make a mistake you have to make two million of them.

Even the simple things have bugs. If I go out for a cup of coffee, the coffee is lukewarm, half in the saucer, and the sugar shaker is empty. Sometimes the sugar shaker is full, but the sugar is stuck and won't come out. It sticks like the salt and the ketchup. The waitress is sympathetic and the boss is in Florida.

We have a girl who comes in once a week to clean. She comes in once a week when she comes in. Every other week she is at a picnic for the church or a mass baptism. Now and then she sends her younger sister, who always has to leave early for a barbecue, a fish fry, or to meet her boy friend - who, by the way, is supposed to come and wash our windows, but when he wins on the numbers, he doesn't come. When he loses, he doesn't come either. He gets depressed.

Neither of the girls will dry dishes. They say the dishes dry themselves, don't they? That's right. They do.

When either of the girls does come, she has trouble washing my shirts. The seams come apart when exposed to water. I don't know of anything else to wash them in. Long threads appear as if by magic. Detergents work hard at going down deeply into the hidden dirt and dislodging the pickets at the same time. I checked with the haberdashery. They say all the shirts are coming through that way today.

I checked with the factory. They admitted that they had trouble with the seams and threads in the new miracle fabrics, which are so new and so miraculous, no one really understands them. Another few years and everything will be all right as far as men's shirts go. After all, I shouldn't feel hurt. Women's dresses come apart at the seams, too. It isn't that they're just picking on me. We're all in this thing together.

Many errors made in manufacturing today are the result of the machines being almost human, I'm told. To err is human, and these machines err. One machine does as much work as twenty men and makes more mistakes. That shows how human they are.

Then, again, when I take a bus downtown (because my new car has a bug in it), the bus is ten minutes late and the driver cannot change a dollar. I have to borrow from fellow passengers while the driver rants about people who do not have the exact change ready. While he is thus remonstrating he passes three stops, leaving six people stranded (people who, when they finally get to work, will take their revenge by making shirts that come apart at the seams and furniture that comes unglued, or even rockets whose third stage just laughs).

Nor is there any hope in the younger generation. Take a few girls I know who are college age. They transferred last year from Gates to Jaswell because, say, at Gates the crew is no good and the boys from nearby Klunk Tech are drips. At Jaswell they drop French for ceramics and English Lit. for Bronze Dipping. But they are not satisfied at Jaswell because the only place where there are good schools is Europe. So they go off to Milan, Paris, or Edinburgh. European schools are tough; seven majors a day and no fooling around. So our girls drop all that nonsense and take gouache painting, music appreciation, gastronomy, and found-object sculpture. In the end it will take them seven years to graduate, but meanwhile the living is easy, and only hard-pressed Papa with his seams coming apart and his table legs coming unglued need worry.

It's the same with the boys. Most of them are in Germany living with quaint little families, speaking bad German and learning dueling in order to bring home some scars. Others are roaming about with knapsacks on their backs, sampling Switzerland and Yugoslavia and writing sharp letters home about why are we behind in the missile race and how come we have no great poets like Dante and Goethe?

We are living in a culture entirely new in the world, a culture of responsibility dodgers and corner cutters. Nobody cares if a thing is right or not. In fact, if you try to trace a poor job of craftsmanship back, you will find, inevitably, that nobody did it.

It infuriates me terribly, and meanwhile my buttons keep on falling off.

"State and Local Preparation for Curtailment of Defense Spending"

by John S. Gilmore
Denver Research Institute
University of Denver

This paper will offer four propositions:

(1) That the Colorado economy is substantially dependent on defense spending;

(2) That data are available to estimate this dependency, if not measure it;

(3) That curtailment of Colorado defense spending could result from several different events or circumstances;

(4) That local planning for curtailment problems is appropriate, and that specific planning actions by state government, local government, and industrial firms can be proposed.

The first two propositions will be briefly examined, and a little more attention will be given to the last two.

Direct Defense Income

The personal income directly resulting from defense spending in Colorado reached an estimated $439 million in 1962. A comparable estimate for 1950 was $99 million.[1] This income represents wage and salary payments from U. S. Atomic Energy Commission activities in the state; from military disbursements to both troops and civilian employees; and from military procurement of goods and services. Wages and salaries resulting from National Aeronautics and Space Administration activities are not considered significant during the period 1950-1962. The composition of defense personal income for this period is shown in Table I. Its origins within the state are largely in the East Slope Counties between Fort Collins and Pueblo, and in the West Slope Counties containing the Uravan Mineral Belt.[2]

Other indication of the importance of defense economic activity can derive from comparing it with the types of economic activity which used to be considered the main supports of the Colorado economy -- agriculture and mining.[3] Defense personal income is now far bigger than personal income from those two sources, combined.

The Total Effect

More important, possibly, is the function of defense economic activity within the system of the Colorado economy. Defense economic activity results in the import of purchasing power into Colorado, in exchange for the export of defense goods and defense services. Thus, defense activity can be described as a basic industry, which buys goods and services locally and thus supports more economic activity in local service industries. Both this direct and indirect defense economic activity induce demand for consumer goods and services which then is manifested in further support of the local service industries.[4] The sum of all these makes up the gross economic impact that defense spending brings to the Colorado regional economy.

How great is this total economic impact? Just how much of the Colorado economy depends on direct defense activity, indirect defense activity, and defense-induced consumer demand?

We have no precise answer. No study has yet been made of the inter-industry relationships in the State of Colorado, and such a study might cost $200,000 or more. However, such studies have been made of other regional economies, and their results give us a basis for estimating the order of magnitude of the gross economic impact of defense spending in Colorado.

The crucial information in these other studies is the multiplier factor indicating the additional jobs in the study area supported by each direct defense job, or the additional personal income supported by direct defense personal income. These multipliers range from a factor of $0.85 additional personal income immediately supported by each dollar of personal income from military aircraft production in the St. Louis Metropolitan Area (a 1958 study by Werner Hirsch); to a multiplier of 4.03 additional jobs eventually supported by each defense manufacturing or construction job in the State of California (a 1960 study by Tiebout, Hansen, and Robson).[5]

From a study of that material, it is here assumed that each equivalent direct defense job in Colorado eventually supports about two additional jobs within the entire state; through both indirect defense employment and defense induced consumption employment. This is not to say that each direct defense job is directly linked to two other jobs, but rather that the direct defense employment supports a certain amount of indirect defense employment, and that the consumption of these two together supports, over the medium or long run, a substantial share of the local service employment in the state.

The total then, of all three categories of defense supported employment is estimated to be three times the direct defense employment. The same multiplier is applied to the personal income generated by direct defense employment. Such an estimated multiplier is certainly not precise, but it is believed to indicate the order of magnitude of total defense supported personal income.

With this multiplier of 3, and with the income figures already described, some estimate can be made of the importance of defense spending to the Colorado regional economy in 1962.

Table III

1962 PERSONAL INCOME

Personal Income from Direct Defense Employment	Personal Income from Total Defense Supported Employment (Col. (1) X 3 .)	Colorado Personal Income from Production (Including military activity)	Total Colorado Personal Income
$ 439 million	$1,317 million	$3,674 million	$4,520 million

Source: Estimates in this paper; and "Personal Income by States," Survey of Current Business 43 (August 1963), pp. 7-15

On this basis, personal income from total defense supported employment was 36 percent of all Colorado personal income derived from the production of goods and services, and was 29 percent of total Colorado personal income. Allowing for error, these magnitudes still indicate that the Colorado economy is substantially dependent on defense spending.

SECTION II. THE POSSIBILITIES OF CURTAILMENT

If defense spending is this important to the Colorado economy, or anywhere near this important, any prospect of major curtailment of defense spending in the state appears crucially significant. Therefore, it seems worthwhile to identify some of the possible causes of defense spending curtailment, to review what has been written about the economic remedies which might accompany such curtailment, and to conjecture briefly about the implications to the Colorado community of possible curtailment.

Types of Curtailment

A. The completion or cancellation of military procurement contracts is always a hazard to communities neighboring large defense manufacturers. For instance, in the case of Martin-Denver, newspaper reports have indicated that procurement of its present product, Titan II, will be completed in 1964. The trade press has voiced uncertainty about the future of the follow-on Titan III.[6] Furthermore, the Martin-Denver plant was built to handle 120-inch diameter missiles or vehicles, and it may not be readily feasible for it to fabricate the larger vehicles that future space programs may require. It may be difficult for larger vehicles to be transported from Denver to remote launching sites best served by ocean transportation.[7] Thus, contract cancellation or contract completion without follow-on work appears to be just as real a possibility for Colorado defense manufacturers as it has been for those in other states.

B. Another type of local defense spending curtailment can result from fluctuations in troop strength at a military post or base. During its twenty year history, Fort Carson has housed as many as two divisions (during World War II) and as few as a few battalions (before the Korean War). This sort of variation can reflect changes in force levels of the entire establishment, or it can come from routine changes in troop assignments.

C. One foreseeable curtailment of Colorado defense expenditures is unique in that it has already been announced, several years before it is to be put into effect. The Atomic Energy Commission has announced cessation of its uranium-concentrate buying program, effective in 1970. The present rate of purchase will be substantially decreased between now and 1967.[8] Although it is possible that this AEC decision will be modified, or that there will be a substantial non-governmental demand for uranium by 1970, present prospects are that most of the Colorado uranium industry may be shut down by or during 1970.

These first three types of defense spending curtailment are essentially localized; if the defense employment were cut back only in Colorado, similar employment would probably be available elsewhere to the individual workers. The major categories of direct defense employment concerned -- missile and aircraft workers, soldiers, and miners -- all are notably mobile. The direct employment and consumption-induced employment and income presently supported in Colorado by the state's direct defense employment would certainly suffer, however.

The remaining three types of defense spending curtailment are different in nature. They would have profound local and nationwide economic implications. They would all bring cutbacks in specific defense activities almost uniquely concentrated in Colorado.

D. Either the total quantity of defense spending or the types of goods and services bought by defense spending might be substantially altered by some form of arms control between the United States and the Soviet Union. Such an agreement might be either a formal treaty, or the tacit result of unilateral decisions to limit the development or use of certain types of weapons.[9] For example, both powers have apparently hesitated to commit themselves to all-out development of orbital or other space weapons systems. Neither nation has used or permitted its auxiliaries to use nuclear weapons in the conflicts since World War II.

As a result of this self-applied inhibition, the United States at least, has substantially altered the pattern of its military procurement. In contrast with the days of almost total dependence on the "massive retaliation" concept, the United States has recently devoted large sums to rebuilding its conventional or non-nuclear forces. The Army has new rifles, tanks, and other vehicles; tactical aircraft procurement in the Air Force has been changed to develop a better non-nuclear capability.[10]

Table IV

SHIFTS IN MILITARY SPENDING EMPHASIS,
ACCORDING TO DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE PROGRAM

Budget Requests (Billions)

Program	Fiscal 1962	Fiscal 1963	Fiscal 1964
Strategic Retaliatory Forces	$ 7.5	$ 9.3	$ 7.3

Source: Aviation Week 76, (January 22, 1962) p. 27.
Aviation Week 78, (January 21, 1963) p. 27.

It has been authoritatively suggested that a likely form of formal arms control would concentrate on discouraging the use of strategic nuclear weapons and their delivery systems, that the cessation of production of these systems might be the most-easily concluded formal agreement on arms control, and that such an agreement might lead to even more demand for conventional weapons like those listed above.[11]

Any such shift in the mix of weapons demand could have substantial effect. Colorado's defense manufacturing is largely devoted to nuclear weapons systems; the state has little or no production of rifles, tanks, tactical aircraft, war ships, or other conventional systems.

E. Both the United States and the Soviet Union have proposed programs for general and complete disarmament, and the two have agreed in principle on the need for such disarmament. Negotiations toward an actual treaty go ahead sporadically at Geneva. The biggest single difference appears to be on the point in the disarmament process at which unlimited international inspection of each nation's war-making capability will go into effect. Another point of difference lies in the period of time allotted for disarming; the United States plan allows approximately 8-12 years, the Soviet Union proposes a 4 year process. In each, halting the production of nuclear weapons and delivery system is among the early steps.[12]

F. Finally, a substantial degree of disarmament -- internationally inspected and controlled disarmament -- might suddenly result from a major international crisis or accident. The fear of an imminent major war might precipitate such an agreement.[13] That was almost the case during the Cuban incident of 1962 (where Khruschev and Kennedy agreed on inspection of Cuba, but found themselves unprepared to carry out the agreement); it might result from an accidental nuclear detonation, or a limited war which threatened to escalate into a nuclear exchange.

In most of the imaginable cases of hurried disarmament, the precipitating factor would probably be the threat of a nuclear exchange between the United States and the Soviet Union. Therefore, the most immediate effort would probably be toward alleviating that threat with the supervised dismantling of existing offensive nuclear weapons delivery systems (such as the Lowry AFB Titans) and the inspection of manufacturing facilities capable of producing such systems (such as the Martin plant, and others).

In each of the above three situations involving arms control or disarmament, there is the presumption that the first curtailments would fall on those defense activities devoted to the production or to the operational use of offensive (or "deterrent," or "retaliatory") nuclear weapons and delivery systems. Colorado appears to have an unmatched degree of involvement with such systems.

On the other hand, it might be assumed that the last defense activities to be curtailed under those circumstances would be facilities devoted exclusively to defensive weapons or capabilities. Thus, the North American Air Defense Headquarters at Colorado Springs might stay in business as long as any U. S. military facility, and its communications and data processing equipment would make it a logical location for a major facility of an international peacekeeping and inspection system.

The Effects of Curtailment

Given Colorado's substantial economic dependence on defense spending, each of the above described curtailment situations would probably damage the state's economy. The shape and sum of the damage would vary widely according to the exact circumstances. The possible remedies for the problems would vary almost infinitely.

To help with local curtailments, the contract terminations or the cutbacks in troops, the Secretary of Defense maintains an Office of Economic Adjustment. This is a small group, armed with little but advice based on their experience from working with community leaders in communities which have suffered curtailment of defense spending.[14] General, or nationwide, curtailment of defense spending would undoubtedly have much more serious economic impacts.

Two studies of the economic effects, at the national level, of negotiated disarmament have been published recently after being performed for the Program of Research on Economic Adjustments to Disarmament (READ). Although the Colorado regional economy is quite different from the national economy in magnitude and in industry mix, some of the READ studies' results can be translated into magnitudes appropriate to the Colorado economy and in that way they may furnish indicators of what might happen here.

One study by Daniel B. Suits used the econometric model of the Research Seminar in Quantitative Economics at the University of Michigan. This, a 32 equation forecasting model, was programmed to analyze the effects of a reduction in the U. S. defense budget from $60.2 billion in 1965 to $28.2 billion in 1977 (a 12 year period of disarmament). The cutback was apportioned approximately 1/3 to military salaries and 2/3 to military procurement.

The model indicated that the expected curtailment would reduce employment by 5.2 million jobs (about 7.8 percent) which might double if private investment rates fell substantially. This cut in employment might be limited to 1.5 million, the model indicated, with a $13.2 billion tax cut, and $10 billion worth of additional federal grants to support state and local government spending.[15]

It is Suits' assumption that the problem would be to maintain effective demand, in the fact of this curtailment of defense spending and in the effective demand supported by it. The same assumption is made by the others whose work is reviewed here.

The second study was an examination of the short-run effect of reducing the military budget by 20 percent and simultaneously reallocating that dollar amount of effective demand to other purposes, e.g., personal consumption, residential construction, exports to China, etc. The figures used were 1958, and they were processed through an updated version of Leontief's 1947 input-output table.

If these figures are reduced to indicate the effect of reallocating $600 million (a rough estimate of current annual defense purchases of goods and services in Colorado) away from defense, the gross loss in defense supported employment would range from 62,700 jobs to 73,300 jobs. After the $600 million was then added to the alternative types of final demand, assuming complete substitutability of the displaced labor and other factors, and assuming they would still be used in Colorado economic activity,* there would still be a net loss of 22,500 to 42,800 jobs in all but one of the alternative categories. The only shift which would result in a net increase in Colorado employment would be reallocation of the entire $600 million into government employment within the state. In that case, there would be a net increase of 37,200 jobs.[17]

A number of more subjective studies have touched on what might happen in case of general curtailment, and on what might be done about it -- at the national level. An article by Leo and Betty Fishman suggests that a substantial disarmament program spread over seven years, with the decrease in federal expenditures applied entirely on national debt reduction, could result in over 21 million unemployed. This forecast suggests that such disaster could be avoided by appropriate fiscal and budgetary policies; what is appropriate would depend on the state of the economy at the time a disarmament agreement is concluded.[16]

Another article, by Warren Smith, defines the problem as one of keeping aggregate demand in the U. S. economy growing at a rate of $28-35 billion a year, in spite of declining defense expenditures. Smith suggests that this can best be done through budget and tax changes. He says that these should be within the discretionary power of the President in order to promptly cope with the "announcement effects" of a disarmament agreement, the immediate deflationary impacts on business and consumer expectations.[18]

---

* This assumption is probably too optimistic; some of the alternative demands would probably involve economic activities not oriented toward Colorado locations. Richard Nelson says, "Quite possibly something should be done to reduce the cost of moving (scientists and engineers) since there is likely to be a considerable shift in the geographical composition of demand." Richard R. Nelson, "The Impcat of Arms Reduction on R & D," American Economic Review, LIII, (May 1963) pp. 436-446.

Leslie Fishman examines four alternative policy approaches, and summarizes their effects:

> An income tax cut is quite buoyant, particularly if it emphasizes the lower-and middle-income groups. A corporate profits tax reduction is quite deflationary, except if it were to result in price reductions -- not a very likely possibility. Increases in government spending for non-armaments is likely to be mildly buoyant and stimulating. Finally, reduction of the federal debt is likely to be extremely deflationary.[19]

And Adolph Strumthal emphasizes that two sets of policies will be needed to solve the employment problems resulting from disarmament; general full-employment policies to establish the volume of effective demand at a satisfactory level; and specific policies to absorb the local, industrial and occupational "pockets" of unemployment resulting from disarmament.[20]

Colorado's Problems

This has not been an exhaustive examination of alternative federal reactions to the economic problems of disarmament, but it may furnish some idea of the problems which disarmament or other curtailment of defense spending might bring to Colorado. To summarize these:

A substantial part of the Colorado economy appears to presently depend on defense spending. The Colorado defense activities complex is particularly oriented toward nuclear weapons and long-range delivery systems.

There are a number of foreseeable circumstances in which defense spending might be curtailed with substantial impact on local areas within the state, or on the entire state. In the case of arms control or disarmament, there will probably be federal action to minimize economic dislocation during the transition. In both those circumstances, and in case of localized curtailments, there are also apt to be unique local problems.

Since Colorado has more than its proportional share (e.g., a share commensurate with its 1 percent of U. S. population and 1 percent of U. S. personal income) of defense activities, it might be unusually susceptible to a nationwide curtailment of defense spending.

Table V

COLORADO'S "SHARE" OF POPULATION,
PERSONAL INCOME, & DEFENSE ACTIVITY -- 1962

Colorado has 1.0 % of U. S. Personal Income

Colorado has 1.0 % of U. S. Population

With much of the state's defense manufacturing committed to very advanced technology (aerospace and nuclear weapons),* those plants and personnel may represent rather non-mobile resources. They may not be readily adaptable to production of consumer goods and industrial goods, the demand for which might replace the demand for weapons.[21]

Further complicating reconversion problems is Coloardo's remoteness from both large consumer markets and oceangoing ports. Recent study has indicated that locally manufactured goods with a value of less than $2.00 a pound are difficult to transport and market in the mass markets outside the state.[22]

Such localized factors as these indicate that localized problems would exist, and that local planning and decisions would probably be needed for their solutions.

* Colorado military contracting in 1962 was the most specialized of that in any of the 15 leading military contracting states. Eighty-six percent of Colorado's military contracts were for missile programs, and this was further specialized by the Titan program's domination of Colorado military economic activity. See Five Year Trends in Defense Procurement 1958-1962. (Washington: Office of the Secretary of Defense, 1963) p. 9ff.

SECTION III THE NEED FOR PLANNING

> Planning -- "....thinking in ways that will lead you to do something better. What do we start doing now that we're not doing? What do we stop doing that we are now doing?"
> Walt W. Rostow[23]

The first requisite of planning is problem identification. It does appear that curtailment of defense spending would affect such Colorado state governmental agencies as those concerned with employment and unemployment compensation, welfare, vocational education and retraining, education, and economic development. Depending on the degree of curtailment, cities, counties, and school districts might be up against sudden changes in population and tax base. Hasty professional retraining problems might be required of the universities. Industrial firms might face entirely new requirements for their product design, production, and marketing operations. Labor organizations might find themselves representing workers whose highest skills were no longer in demand, and whose seniority would be useless in protecting obsolete jobs.

More difficult to plan for would be some of the major institutional changes that might affect a variety of agencies or organizations. For instance, the verification, inspection, and enforcement activities required by a disarmament or arms control agreement might include the inspection of all transportation media, as means of detecting secret production or deployment of nuclear weapons. Hypothetically, international inspection teams, with the right of unlimited search, might be stationed in a ring around Denver -- a major weapons production center. This might involve such things as 15 or 20 inspectors, from all nations, living in towns like Castle Rock (population 1,280) with their families, enjoying some sort of diplomatic immunity or extra-terratorial privileges. Their function would be stopping, opening, and inspecting the cargoes of both private and public freight carriers, looking for prohibited weapons. They would probably require access to all waybills, bills of lading, and other transportation documents. Perishable cargoes might spoil as a result of delay or inspection, raising new questions of liability. Waiting time for truck and train crews during inspection would doubtless be topics for collective bargaining. Many other problems might arise from inspection.

The costs of such social and economic changes might be considerable; but our society may have incurred such costs when it acquired nuclear weapons and the ability to deliver them any place on the globe in the face of any foreseeable defense. Criteria for judging the acceptability or feasibility of these costs, such as costs of inspection, are hard to identify; the only measure this writer can propose is comparison with the discounted contingent cost of failing to achieve disarmament with international control of weapons. One estimate of these costs, the costs of failure, is offered by Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara, answering a question about what the military situation would be after a nuclear exchange between the Soviet Union and the United States:

> This is a question we have considered, and I can't answer it. I think probably the fatalities in Western Europe would approach 90 million, the fatalities in the United States would approach 100 million, and the fatalities in the Soviet Union would approach 100 million.

> Now when you consider on the order of 300 million people dead in these areas, it is very difficult to conceive of what kind of military weapons ..... would continue to exist. We have nonetheless faced that issue, and we have systems provided that we believe would survive.
> But it exceeds the extent of my imagination to conceive of how those forces might be used, and of what benefit they would be to our Nation at that point.[24]

After weighing some of the problems of disarmament against the discounted costs of using nuclear arms, the government of the United States has chosen a policy of asking for general and complete disarmament.[25] One official statement has noted that disarmament could bring economic problems of structural or geographic unbalance, and that efforts would be necessary to maintain aggregate economic demand. The statement went on to take an optimistic view, concluding that:

> With advance planning and sensible policies at all levels of government and on the part of business and labor, it should be possible to master both of these problems satisfactorily.[26]

Although much of the "advance planning and sensible policies" must come from the federal government, within the State of Colorado certain suggestions for local action might be appropriate. All of them apply to planning for either local curtailment or general curtailment:

(1) Identify potential demand for additional goods and services which might be required in the future from both the public and private sectors of the Colorado economy. Planning should be for more than just the transition during the actual time of defense spending curtailment; it should also cover the period of redevelopment afterwards. This indicates a need for analyzing the effective demand (for goods and services) that might be created by government action to ease the transition, and for identifying prospective new or additional demand that might exist in both the public and private sectors of the economy afterwards. Two studies of this sort have totalled large additional demand figures for the national economy (see Table VI), but more detailed and localized data seem appropriate for Colorado industrial firms and government agencies.

(2) State government agencies and city, county, and regional planning agencies should carry on planning for defense curtailment and reconversion. The present period of high defense spending and relative prosperity in Colorado would seem as appropriate a time as will ever exist for all government agencies to start examining this problem.

Economic development agencies -- in the state government, in chambers of commerce, and in the public utilities and banks -- should seek to identify and develop opportunities for non-defense industry and other economic activity in Colorado. The possibilities for legislative action toward this end should also be studied.

At the local level, planning commissions and planning consultants might include a defense spending dependency analysis in their economic base studies.[28] This, in turn, would be of help to city and county agencies and school boards. There is a specific opportunity and need for the large uranium milling and mining firms, the AEC, and the local governments in the West Slope uranium mining area to jointly support research and planning to minimize the impact of curtailed uranium production.

(3) Colorado industrial firms and other employers, particularly those engaged in defense production, could be encouraged to carry on reconversion planning. The Department of Defense has vaguely suggested that this be done,[29] but the state government might offer greater incentive by legislatively offering state corporate tax credits (or other tax incentives) for such planning expenditures.

(4) The State of Colorado, and its Congressional delegation, might actively push for more preparation and planning by the federal government for the problems of curtailment and reconversion. With Colorado's economy partly supported by more-than-average levels of defense spending, the state can anticipate more-than-average problems from curtailment. Therefore, the state authorities might ask for an aggressive and credible* federal program to identify and plan for curtailment problems. A credible federal program is here defined as one clearly showing government concern for curtailment planning, and one effectively encouraging examples of planning effort at every level of government.

It might also be pointed out that, if the federal plans are to work, it is necessary for state and local governments and industrial firms to have some idea what the federal reconversion plans will be so that local planning can harmonize with them.

* For credibility, an audience should believe that the communicator knows what he is talking about (expertness factor), and it must believe the communicator wants to give out the full story to the best of his abilty (trustworthiness factor). See Carl I. Hovland, Irving L. Janis, and Harold H. Kelley, Communication and Persuasion: Psychological Studies of Opinion Change, (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1953), p. 21. For a study of some problems befalling a federal planning agency which failed to establish itself as a credible source of information and advice on the problem it was supposed to solve, see John S. Gilmore, Public Acceptance of an Optional Home Fallout Shelter, (Denver: Denver Research Institute, University of Denver, 1961).

Conclusion

These suggestions depend mostly on political action. This seems appropriate; the major problem -- general curtailment of defense spending -- would probably result from a political action: the conclusion of an international agreement on arms control or disarmament. Such an agreement would be politically difficult to conclude and accept if it promised only economic uncertainty and possible disaster. Since such an agreement appears to be a possibility, since there is uncertainty as to how it might come about, since it might even be concluded on short notice under threats of military catastrophe, it seems only reasonable that we do what we can to prepare and plan for it. The present degree of uncertainty is a credit to no one. As Kenneth Boulding says:

> The implication of all this analysis is that disarmament is now no longer a dream of the idealist, but has become a matter of intense practical concern. It represents a social system with very large payoffs, a system which is difficult to achieve, but in which the payoffs are so large that it is well worth devoting major resources to the end of achieving them. This is why a discussion of the economic consequences of disarmament is something more than playing with pipe dreams. It is one small step in a long intellectual process. That fact that the economic consequences of disarmament for the United States, for instance, might be calamitous if the transition were not handled wisely is one small obstacle on the path that leads to a much better state of the world than we have now. Even though a very large stone blocks the entrance to the path, in the shape of the world bargaining problem and the extreme difficulty of achieving a world social contract under present conditions, it is important to work on the path as a whole and to gain experience in removing those obstacles that at least we know how to remove.[29]

LABOR DEVELOPMENTS, International. The pattern of international labor developments during 1963 continued to show industrialized countries increasing their gross national product while underdeveloped countries stagnated, largely because of inadequate capital and capital goods to stimulate economic growth. Population growth continued at a pace that made it difficult for such countries to maintain even the existing per capita incomes and living standards. Automation in many forms spread rapidly in much of the industrialized world, bringing with it greater output and productive capacity but also threatening to increase the number of unemployed. In the United States it was estimated that an average of at least 2 million workers per year will be displaced by automation during the 1960's, creating a tremendous challenge to the economy. See AUTOMATION.

Labor developments and the industrial relations climate were influenced quite naturally by the labor-management relations climate within the various countries, the activities of the trade unions and the international labor organizations, and the policies of governments.

International Organizations. The International Confederation of Free Trade Unions reported a membership of 57 million in 108 countries. The World Federation of Trade Unions, an organization of communist oriented unions, claimed a membership of 120 million. A third small international organization, the IFCTU, a federation of Catholic trade unions, has members in Western Europe and Latin America. For data on labor organizations, see AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR (AFL-CIO), INTERNATIONAL CONFEDERATION OF FREE TRADE UNIONS, INTERNATIONAL LABOR ORGANIZATION, WORLD FEDERATION OF TRADE UNIONS, and International Federation of Catholic Trade Unions in SOCIETIES.

Efforts to improve economic and working conditions took a variety of forms. The International Labor Organization, a UN specialized agency, waged an active educational campaign to raise economic, health, and safety standards throughout the world. Education and training were stressed in the programs of the labor organizations and the ILO as a means of raising living standards. In the less developed areas, four aspects of population tended to retard economic development: the relatively high rate of population growth, unfavorable age structure, unbalanced population distribution, and inadequately educated and trained manpower. Another important factor related to economic development is the proportion of the population still living in rural areas. Most developing countries have only 5 to 10 percent of their work force in urban and industrial jobs. The stock of high-level manpower possesssed by a country is perhaps one of the best indicators of its state of economic and social advancement. In the most advanced countries the number of persons with 12 years education or its equivalent exceeds 100 per 1,000 inhabitants, while in underdeveloped countries it may be as low as 1 per 1,000.

In the period before Asian and African countries achieved independence, the growth of unionism was frequently accompanied by strikes against the "foreign" employer. Unions were closely allied with political struggles for independence, and many of their leaders moved to government positions. Udomo, a prototype of the new African revolutionary leader once stated, "Our country has three enemies. First there is the white man, then there is poverty, then there is the past." Now familiar with problems of development, he feels that the white man has turned into an ally against poverty. In Latin American countries, which achieved national independence about a century ago, employers cannot as frequently be identified as foreigners. According to the U.S. Department of Commerce, more than 600,000 Latin Americans worked for U.S. companies.

Africa. On the African continent, unionism can be found in all countries except Ethiopia and the Portuguese and Spanish territories. Two trends in African labor organizations during 1963 deserve attention. First, the new surge for "African unity" (demonstrated at the governmental level by the successful Addis Ababa conference in May) dooms the two competing pan-African labor groups. (The All-African Trade Union Federation (AATUF) includes the labor federations of the militantly nonaligned Casablanca bloc nations; the African Trade Union Confederation (ATUC) includes 30 countries' 41 labor federations, half of which were ICFTU affiliates and a quarter were IFCTU members.)

The second trend is that African labor organizations were becoming more and more subordinated to government control. For example, the Moroccan Federation of Labor (UNT) disaffiliated from the ICFTU in January under pressure to follow the government's foreign policy line, and the Algerian Federation of Labor decided not to disaffiliate from the ICFTU after a suggestion from Premier Ben Bella. Almost all governments now place severe restrictions on the right to strike, justifying the restrictions on the grounds that strikes interfere with economic development and deter foreign investment. Even the "moderate" government of Tanganyika exiled the president of the Tanganyikan Federation of Labor, Victor Mkello, for his part in an illegal plantation workers' strike in 1963. Reports of labor unrest were widespread. A report from Lagos, Nigeria on September 28, stated that "More than 200,000 workers were on strike in different parts of the country today to back union demands for a commission of inquiry into pay scales." The strike was called off after the demands for an inquiry were granted.

African labor unions continued to play an important political role. Serving as training grounds for leaders, unions provided top-level and secondary leaders in most countries; examples are Cyrille Adoula of the Congo, Rashidi Kawawa of Tanganyika, and Tom Mboya of Kenya. The unions represent an economic and political elite, and an estimated 14 million African workers accept the directives of union leaders, even though many of them are not union members. The ICFTU, with 28 affiliates in Africa, has an African Regional Organization, with headquarters in Lagos, Nigeria, and its Kampala Labor College in Uganda trains union leaders. The IFCTU has 14 affiliates which participate in its Pan-African Workers' Congress, formed in 1960. The WFTU has only seven affiliates in Africa, the only significant one in Guinea. The AFL-CIO and the central bank of the West German unions each loaned $375,000 during 1963 for a 287 family-unit housing project in Nairobi, Kenya, which will provide employment for 300 workers for the next two years. See AFRICA.

Asia. There were few noteworthy developments in 1963 among Asian labor organizations. The ICFTU continued to work with its regional affiliates. The WFTU had tensions within its Asian affiliates over the question of which side to take in the Sino-Soviet rift. (See WORLD COMMUNISM.) The ILO continued to send productivity missions to various countries. However, there has been phenomenal development in Japan (q.v.). The development since 1952 was made possible, in part, through the efforts of the Japanese Productivity Center begun in 1955 with assistance from the U.S. and Japanese governments. The Japanese Trade Union Congress (Zenro-Kaigi) in September 1963 voted to establish a JTUC Solidarity Fund to collect a total of 100 million yen to support trade union development in Asia and Africa. On the domestic front the JTUC called upon the government to take stronger steps to halt the price rises that accompany increased production. It charged that the SOHYO labor federation, which claims to be neutralist, is actually in the communist camp, and cited a visit to the Soviet Union by 30 of its members and plans to send members to a women's conference of the WFTU at Bucharest, Rumania, in October.

Europe. The most noteworthy labor developments in Europe involved labor disputes. The most turbulent occurred in France (q.v.) in March 1963, when 180,000 miners walked off their jobs in government-run coal mines. They demanded an 11 percent wage hike to "catch up" with wage levels in private industry, particularly because prices had risen 17 percent since 1958, increasing 5 percent in 1962–63.

LABOR EDUCATION PROGRAM OFF TO A GOOD START

.....NOTICE.....

CLEAR sponsors Special Symposium on Employment with Colorado Labor Council

A special symposium on the "Economic, Political and Psychological Aspects of Employment" is scheduled at the Hotel Albany, 1411-17th St., Denver, on May 22-23. Sponsored in cooperation with the Colorado Labor Council, the program will bring together experts from labor, government and the academic community to discuss one of the most basic problems facing America.

Out of state speakers will include: Nat Goldfinger, Washington, D.C., Director of Research, AFL-CIO; Prof. Joel Seidman, University of Chicago and a representative of the President's Council of Economic Advisors. University of Colorado faculty members on the program include: Professors Leslie Fishman, Machael Kalk, Dorothy Martin, and George Zinke. Others are: Prof. Donald Seastone, CSU, and Prof. John S. Gilmore, of Denver University (invited) and William Bailey, Director of the Denver office of Manpower, Automation and Training (invited).

Sessions will begin at 7:15 P.M. on Friday the 22nd and continue through Saturday afternoon. The registration fee is $6 per person, including Saturday luncheon. Checks should be made payable to the University of Colorado and mailed to CLEAR, 102 Woodbury Hall, Boulder.

Unions are invited to consider sending representatives at their next meeting. Please use the application blank on the back page.

Over 300 Enrolled in Short-Course by Feb. 1

Labor Education short-courses have been held or are scheduled in seven of the State's eight Central Labor Bodies since Professor Walter H. Uphoff, formerly Director of Labor Education at the University of Minnesota, joined the CU faculty last July.

Courses given to date include "Leadership Training", "Union Administration", "The Worker as a Citizen", and "Steward Training". A course on "Effective Speaking on Current Labor Issues" is scheduled to begin at Fort Collins in March.

The largest class to date was held at Grand Junction for the Trades & Labor Assembly January 30th to February 1st, where 64 persons from 12 locals participated.

Other courses offered by CLEAR this fall and winter include:

LaJunta (Otero County Central Labor Council: Three week-end courses in October, November and December. 25 enrolled from 7 locals.

Denver Area Labor Federation: An 8-week course on "The Worker as a Citizen" - with 33 persons enrolled from 16 locals. Another course is scheduled to begin February 5th.

Northern Colorado Labor Council: Four sessions at Fort Collins and 4 at Greeley with 37 enrolled from 8 locals.

Colorado Springs Area Labor Council: Two all-day Saturday sessions held to date and another to be scheduled. 15 enrolled.

Colorado Union of Public Employees (CUPE) at Pueblo had 24 persons from public employee locals in that area take part in an introductory course on "Grievance Procedure for Public Employees" on December 5th.

Response to a question put to members of Local #189
American Federation of Teachers (Workers' Education Local)

Question: In terms of priorities for labor education, what do you think are the important educational needs of trade unionists today?

We must remember that trade unions are made up of: 1) officers and leaders (at various levels), 2) interested and active members and 3) inactive dues payers. Obviously each group has different interests and needs. Labor education programs must develop and present materials that deal with the fundamental issues of our time as well as continue to provide the "bread and butter" courses asked for (since personnel in organizations obviously change with time and do not absorb information or training by osmosis).

Both leaders and members need help in "broadening their horizons" on such subjects as:

1. Understanding How Our Economy Functions
2. Comparative Economic and Political Systems
3. The Worker as a Citizen
4. The Role of Collective Bargaining and the Role of Government in Meeting the Needs of Workers
5. Understanding Psychology and Human Behavior
6. Unions in Historical Perspective
7. The Requirements of a Full-employment Economy
8. Constructive Use of Automation and Technology
9. Factors Causing International Tensions
10. Economic and Political Factors in Armaments and Disarmaments
11. Understanding the Civil Rights Struggle
12. Understanding the "Left", "Right" and "Center"
13. Effective Written and Oral Communication

Without at least some skill in (#13) passing on at least part of what is learned in the other 12 areas: 1) to other members, 2) to family and friends and 3) to the broader community, the value of the knowledge received is minimal. This skill can be reflected in better resolutions at conventions; more interesting union meetings; better union publications and newsletters; good letters to the daily press; effective participation in forums, radio and TV programs; active participation in community affairs; and sounder union programs for: 1) full and fair employment, 2) world peace, 3) civil liberties and 4) a greater degree of political and economic democracy.

There is also need for more intensive and extensive study for leaders who have already participated in basic courses and experimentation on the best way to reach the people who should be reached.

COURSE ON "COLLECTIVE BARGAINING" TO BE GIVEN AT DENVER CENTER THIS FALL

Economics 462, "The Economics of Collective Bargaining" will be given at the Denver Center on Friday evenings from 5:35 to 7:55 starting September 24 and continuing until January 28. The course will be taught by Professor Bob Repas of Michigan State University who will be on the CLEAR staff part-time for 1965-66. This is one of the courses which Professor G. W. Zinke teaches at Boulder and which he has also taught at the Denver Center.

While pre-requisites and permission of instructor are required for college credit, adults who may not have all the required background can also take the course, but without receiving credit. The fee is $39. Persons interested in registering for the course are urged to contact the Denver Center, 1100 14th St. for a bulletin. Phone 244-6081. Registration dates are Sept. 14 for graduate students from 4:00 to 7:30 P.M. Undergraduate students M through Z, 10:00 A.M. to 1:00 P.M. and 4:00 to 7:30 P.M. on Sept. 15. Undergraduates A through L will be registered at the above hours on Sept. 16. There will be an additional fee for late registrants

Professor Bob Repas of Michigan State University Joins CLEAR Staff for 1965-66

Bob Repas, Associate Professor of Labor and Industrial Relations at Michigan State University will be on sabbatical leave from that institution and has agreed to assist CLEAR with its labor education programs on a half-time basis this year. His other time will be spent doing research on collective bargaining among public employees.

Bob has had extensive experience in labor education and will be a welcome addition to the staff. He worked with AFSC&ME Chemical Workers and the ACW. He also taught at the University of Wisconsin School for Workers and was Labor-International Affairs Rep. for the American Friends Service Committee before joining the faculty at Michigan State. In 1949-50 he had a labor fellowship at Ruskin College in England.

"Role of Labor" Course at Denver Center - Second Semester.

Social Science #312, a 3-credit course on "The Role of Labor in the 20th Century" has been given twice on the Boulder Campus and was given at the Denver Center during the spring semester. Twelve union members and eleven students with no union affiliation took the course. Unions represented included: AFT, Bricklayers, Fire Fighters, ITU, Teamsters, Machinists, Pressmen, Lathers, Brewery, Lithographers, Plumbers and Rubber Workers. Five students, who were eligible, took the course for graduate credit by doing heavier assignments.

Unions and union members interested in this course are invited to contact CLEAR or the Denver Center for details before the second semester begins. The course will again be taught by W. H. Uphoff, Professor of Economics & Director of Labor Education.

Wages vs. Benefits

WHO GAINS from the FRINGES? . . . Donna Allen

Hard upon the United Auto Workers' negotiations, in which fringe benefits rather than wages made the headlines, have come newspaper reports that the demands now being prepared by the Steelworkers will also give benefits precedence over money in the pocket. [See "GM Strike: Prototype for More Conflict" by B. J. Widick, The Nation, November 16.] This time it sounds like the ultimate demand: "Above all," the press quotes the union resolution, "we must strive for a total realization of the principle that a steelworker is a person entitled not to just this protection or that, this benefit or that, but total protection of his income, his dignity and, yes, his career."

After twenty-two years, the fringes are more popular than ever, dominating the collective bargaining news from companies large and small. Business publications confirm the headlines: "Fringe costs are rising faster than wages!"

Is this bad? Do employers really oppose fringe benefits? Would they prefer to grant the same amount of money in wages? Would they be better pleased if social gains were won through legislation? Why do the unions emphasize fringes at the expense of wage increases? Are they worth more or less than wages to the worker? To the employer? Is the public interest served by these bargains?

Fringe benefits, as a part of collective bargaining, date from World War II; indeed, they followed within months upon the "wage freeze" imposed in July of 1942 by the War Labor Board. With tripartite unanimity, industry, labor and public members of the War Labor Board agreed that fringe benefits were less inflationary than cash wage increases. Each time it allowed such a benefit, the WLB carefully pointed out why it was non-inflationary. It said, for instance, that a paid vacation merely gave the worker time off; it did not increase his total cash income. And the vacation's cost to the employer was offset by the increase in production he might expect from a well-rested worker.

Historically, unions were uninterested in benefits employers offered, usually outside the negotiated contract. They had so often heard the plans described by the employers as a way to increase productivity, to raise employee morale, to reward certain employees or certain employee behavior, or, sometimes, to discourage unionism, that they looked on the fringe as of more benefit to management than to labor. Moreover, the unions had seen many of these benefit plans come and go: mutual benefit associations, savings plans, and even a few unemployment compensation plans were introduced before the 1920s; and during the 1920s new ones arose, among them group life insurance and stock purchase plans and many pay-as-you-go pension plans. Some were discontinued after a few years' experimentation; the rest vanished in the depression.

Neither workers nor their unions had had any control over these plans, and they therefore welcomed the contractual nature of the WLB-granted fringe benefits which were assured (at least for the duration of the contract) and whose terms and conditions were negotiable. But their real preference was still, as it had been during the 1930s, to win their social benefits through legislation. Benefits so won became clear and legal rights, and were not conditional on the whim or compensating benefit of an individual employer. The unions intended that the war be no more than a partial and temporary interruption to the winning of further social gains by political means.

Accordingly, when controls were lifted after the war and unions were free once again to strike, they concentrated on wage increases in the 1946 "first round" of negotiations, and presented to Congress a broad political program for new so-tial legislation. But it did not take them long to discover that that door was closed to any further progress. At the same time, they found that another door stood slightly ajar. Thus, when the "third round" of postwar negotiations was held in 1949, the fringe-benefit demand was "in full bloom," as the Chamber of Commerce reported in its annual survey.

Divided by attack and hobbled by new laws restricting their political activities, the unions found themselves no match for a Congress that had little disposition to pass either social legislation or the business taxes to finance it. The money was there. The long period of prosperity that had begun with the war was what made the fringe-benefit movement possible; it could as well have financed social legislation.

As it became clear that national health insurance was dead, health and welfare plans began to flourish. Today they cover more than 100 million workers and their dependents. After repeated attempts to make social security benefits more adequate, private pension plans gained popularity and today cover some 23 million workers. When efforts to improve unemployment compensation failed year after year, private plans arose to supplement the public benefits.

Encouragement came from all sides. The Supreme Court ruled that pensions were a negotiable union-management issue; the Internal Revenue Service granted favorable tax treatment for certain fringes; the public, fearing inflation and believing fringe benefits to be less inflationary, applauded the "package" settlements; employers yielded. Thus, as time went on, the workers came to depend upon the fringe-benefit plans and to demand more.

For employers, the choice between wages and fringes is easy—and for the same reasons that had moved them to put forward such plans on their own volition. When an employer says that a bundle of fringe provisions (including their extra administrative expense, but adjusted, though perhaps conservatively, for mortality and turnover rates) will cost him 15c per hour, he is figuring their cost as if paid out in a wage increase. But paid out as fringe benefits, their actual cost is appreciably less than 15c per hour, because almost all fringes offer compensating savings. There is immediately the saving from the more favorable business tax treatment accorded certain fringes—for example, those paid through trust funds: pensions, health and welfare benefits, some vacation plans, supplementary unemployment benefits and the like. In addition, paid vacations, sick leave, and perhaps to some extent all fringes that free workers from worry about illness, accident, old age or unemployment, add to employees' productivity. These and other fringes also help the employer to attract more productive labor and to keep it, thus reducing the cost of turnover.

In another category of fringe benefits, the employer receives a specific and carefully negotiated quid pro quo. Call-in or reporting pay and various overtime premiums allow management to schedule work according to production demands and without adhering strictly to normal working hours. In return for granting an in-lieu-of-notice payment, the employer may keep his workers on a given job up to the last day he needs them, and thus avoid expensive short-term replacements. The employer negotiates on the amount of each of these payments with the estimated saving firmly in mind.

However, the greatest advantage to the employer of granting fringe benefits is that by assuming these social costs himself he may keep them out of legislation, where he would have control over neither cost nor benefit. Private fringe items are negotiable at each contract renewal date, and, as in the prewar decades, employers still find certain employee-benefit plans "not worth it" and seek to be rid of them. Thus, American Motors Corporation said recently that it wished to drop its profit-sharing plan, adopted in the 1961 negotiations. Finally, the money that the employer pays for private fringe benefits goes entirely to his own employees; each one knows the source of the funds that will keep him in his old age, that is paying for his and his family's illnesses. This point was covered by George K. Barrett, Manager of the Employee Relations Division of the Ohio Oil Company, at a management conference on fringe benefits held at the University of Michigan a few years ago:

> I suggest the sixties must be management's decade so far as employee plans are concerned. The needs for improvement and better design of plans are obvious. We know our employees want protection against emergencies. . . . The cost of such emergencies has always been paid, in one way or another. The question for us is "How can the burden best be paid by our society?" I believe the best way is to have the cost appear as close as possible to the individual who benefits.

In short, employers had good reason for leaving the door to fringe benefits slightly ajar, however loudly they may have complained about high fringe-benefit costs.

For his part, the worker's desire for fringe benefits is genuine, even though he may not have had an altogether free choice between private plans and social legislation, or between fringe benefits and further wage increases. The 103-day Chrysler strike for pensions was dramatic proof of labor's commitment on that issue.

Workers value fringes not just because it is obviously more advantageous to pool their social costs than to take more in wages and buy their benefits individually. Presumably, they could realize this saving (at some income-tax loss) by taking the money in wages and negotiating wholly contributory pension, health and welfare, and other plans. But they do not.

They choose to give up an alternative wage increase, or even a vested right to the money in their benefit funds, in order to get protection against the major economic hazards of life at their employer's expense. They seek management's acknowledgment of an industry responsibility for certain social costs which heretofore have been considered their personal responsibility. They seek, in other words, the same industry obligation that social legislation, through taxes, imposes on industry to contribute to the cost of these social needs.

The obverse of the management obligation is the worker's "right" to the benefit, and it grows in the public mind with the prevalence of the benefit. In 1948, when provisions for paid vacations had been instituted by 90 per cent of industry, a board of arbitrators found a paid vacation to be a "right" that superseded even management's "right" to stay in business:

> In present day labor relations the granting of a vacation period to workers is so widely accepted that no industry or company can claim to be exempt from the propriety of this practice. . . . The company claims that it is not financially able to grant vacations with pay. Today, however, common practice decrees, in general, that those who employ workers assume the general obligation of granting them vacations.

Two decades of bargaining on fringe benefits as a right of the worker and a social obligation of the employer have transformed the employer-employee relationship. The employer once had only one obligation: to compensate the employee for his actual work. Now he must additionally assume responsibility for certain social costs of the employee and his family.

Fringe benefits are of three types. There are those that provide time off, without loss of income, for some social use: to recover from illness, to get an annual rest, to vote, to celebrate patriotic and religious holidays, to attend a family funeral, and so on.

A second type, the penalty-premium, is intended to discourage an employer from deviating from an established standard of work scheduling, length of work day or week, or a normal provision of vacation or holiday. Conversely, the payment is a premium to the worker who is forced to accommodate himself.

The third type provides protection against certain economic hazards such as accident or illness or unemployment due to old age, downswing of the business cycle or technological change. These fringes are the health and welfare funds, pensions, severance payments and the like. It is in this category that the Steelworkers seek protection through their insistence upon a "right to continuance of income" and "total job security."

But what of his lack of control over employee benefits that taught the worker his original distrust of them? It can be shown that some of these fringe benefits are illusory, or likely to be dropped altogether if the employer chooses. That is particularly so for the unorganized millions whose fringe benefits are provided voluntarily by the employer, but even contractual benefits can disappear. Although it would be difficult for an employer to drop a benefit that all workers and the public had come to consider an inherent right of employment—and some employers would always find certain fringe benefits worth their cost—the fact remains that fringe benefits are good only as long as the employment relationship, or the contract, lasts. If a plant closes, or technology displaces workers, or a depression arrives, the workers may have nothing left of their health and welfare plan, for instance, except the high cost of medical care. Many pension plans, especially those set up on a company basis, are proving—most noticeably when a company goes out of business—to be inadequately funded. [See "The Pension Mirage" by Merton C. Bernstein, The Nation, June 15, 1964.]

This lack of control, complained about in earlier decades, is today the problem and what the negotiation on fringes is all about. The question at the bargaining table is no longer whether to have fringes, but who is to control them in order to maximize the benefit—for company or employees. In this struggle the unions often argue that the fringe benefit is part of the worker's wages for his service, and that therefore his right to the benefit cannot be restricted as the employer would like. At other times, the employer finds advantage in arguing that fringe benefits are wages. Whether or not, or when, or which fringe payments should be viewed as wages are questions that particularly baffle arbitrators, courts and state and federal administrators because the many laws that define "wages" were all written before the fringe-benefit movement began: the Bankruptcy Act, the Social Security Act, the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Labor-Management Relations Act, state unemployment insurance laws, the Walsh Healey Public Contracts Act and others. Until there is more understanding of the nature of fringe benefits, and until an attempt is made to update the wages concept in existing laws, the worker will find that gaining full control over his social benefits is not easy.

What of the future of fringes, and what of the public interest? As long as the money holds out, there is no end to the number of social needs that the worker can seek to have met for him—and at higher and higher standards of benefit. Currently, the threat of technological displacement keeps union research departments busy devising private plans to meet this newest economic hazard. If medicare continues to be rejected by Congress, more unions may follow the can industry plan of extending their health and welfare plans to cover retirees. Continued Congressional indifference to education and housing would stimulate private proposals in these areas.

Is this entirely good? What about those beyond the fringe? While private plans are being devised to cushion the economic effects of downswings or technological unemployment, what of those who, due to either cause, never find jobs in the first place? For this growing segment of our population, the emphasis on fringe benefits may indeed be too great. Should social benefits depend, first, upon having employment and, second, upon an individual employer's ability to pay? The steelworker is not to be blamed for his desire for total security and career protection. But others have the same dream. The public needs to reconsider its interest in these dreams.

A NEW COURSE ON "THE ROLE OF LABOR" TO BE OFFERED AT DENVER CENTER

A 3-credit course, entitled, "The Role of Labor in the 20th Century" will be given at the Denver Center during the second semester by Walter H. Uphoff, Professor of Economics and Director of Labor Education at the University of Colorado.

The course will examine the role of labor in society, with major emphasis on the United States but including a look at problems and trends in other parts of the world (both developed and underdeveloped countries. It will deal with problems of labor-management relations, labor's legislative and political interests, automation, employment problems, democratic procedures, ethical practices, etc. The course will be of interest to union leaders and members, teachers and university students. This offering is in line with the national trend in labor education to also offer longer and more advanced non-residential courses for union leaders.

The course, numbered Social Science 312 (#512 for teachers and others eligible to take it for graduate credit - with heavier assignments), is part of a growing number of offerings in the University's General Education program. It is now being offered for the second time on the Boulder campus and will be followed by a new course being developed by the School of Business, entitled, "The Role of Business and Management".

The class will meet Thursday evenings, from 8:05 to 10:15 P.M. starting February 4 and continuing until May 20. The course provides for reading assignments in a text by Gitlow entitled, "Labor and Industrial Society", as well as pamphlets and bulletins. Students will also choose one of 55 labor topics for a term paper.

While high school graduation is required for college credit, adults who have not completed high school can also take the course, but without receiving credit. The cost of the course is $39.00. Persons desiring to register for the course are urged to contact the Denver Center, 1100-14th St. for a bulletin. Phone 244-6081. Registration dates are January 25-27 from 10:00 to 1:00 and 4:00 to 7:30 P.M.

Prof. Herman Erickson of U. of Illinois Will Teach for CLEAR Second Semester

Herman Erickson, Professor of Labor and Industrial Relations at the University of Illinois will be a visiting lecturer for CU's CLEAR program from February 1 through May 31, 1965. Erickson has been at Illinois since 1947 and has had extensive experience in teaching labor education courses. He will be available to work with central labor bodies and local unions interested in sponsoring courses on steward training, collective bargaining, economics, etc. Organizations interested in scheduling courses are urged to contact CLEAR (see address on letterhead).

Erickson's coming for 4 months was made possible by foregoing an assistant for the Labor Education Program for the entire year and using some of the income from labor education short-courses conducted to date.

Before going to Illinois, Herman taught WPA Workers Education in Minnesota, was director of the St. Paul Labor College, taught high school at Colfax, Wisconsin and was field representative for the Georgia Workers Education Service. He has been abroad to study Workers Education in Sweden on a Fulbright fellowship (1954-55) and on sabbatical leave (1961-62).

University of Colorado *

PROBLEMS FACING AMERICAN UNIONS

While the American labor movement has made real progress since it achieved "full legal status" in 1935, its membership during the last ten years has not kept pace with the growth in the total labor force. Today unions and their members are concerned with such questions as: 1) job losses due to automation and technology; 2) the rate of economic growth in the nation; and 3) anti-union legislation. For example: Twenty of our 50 states (although only one with a substantial number of industrial workers) have enacted so-called "right-to-work laws" since 1946, which prevent a union and an employer from negotiating an agreement under which all workers belong to the union as a condition of employment.

Unions are also concerned about such matters as: 1) tax policies, 2) fair employment practices, (civil rights), 3) medical care for the aged and other welfare legislation, 4) adequate public support for education, and 4) the threat of "right-wing" extremism. Since between 9 and 10 percent of the nation's economy is involved in military and defense expenditures, many workers feel that if peace should "break out" there would be more unemployment, although it is recognized that military expenditures could be cut back without a loss in jobs if there is adequate planning and legislative support for non-military programs. This creates a situation where perhaps as many workers fear peace as fear communism. As long as the fear of loss of jobs, due to a cut in military expenditures, exists, it is unrealistic to expect much enthusiasm for disarmament negotiations from workers. It should be added that there is a growing number who do see a greater peril in continued reliance on weapons which they know must never be used if mankind is to survive. This writer believes that the biggest challenge to unions today is that of helping create the political and economic climate in which a step-by-step disarmament can be negotiated with the major powers, without the fear that this will give the Communists an advantage. At the same time, they must do the educational work essential to an enlightened public policy toward government's role in developing an economy of full employment.

Internal problems facing unions include matters of: 1) jurisdictional disputes; 2) racial discrimination (which the leadership of most unions are working to eradicate except in some parts of the South); 3) racketeering on the part of a few union leaders; and the bad public image this has given the entire labor movement; 4) membership participation rates; and 5) the need for a better informed membership.

Although, obviously America had unions long before 1935, it was not until the passage of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 (Wagner Act) when workers were granted full rights to organize unions and it became illegal for an employer to discharge a worker for union activity. Between 1935 and 1939 the union membership increased from about 4 million to over 9 million. This rapid growth was no doubt due in part to the rivalry that resulted from the division in the AFL and the formation of the CIO in the fall of 1935, but it could not have taken place without the Wagner Act. Industrial workers in auto, steel, rubber, etc. now had the support of law and the encouragement of CIO organizers to form new unions in industries which until that time were largely unorganized.

* In 1958-59 Prof. Uphoff had a Fulbright Research Grant at the University of Cologne and conducted a research study on the opinions of German union members. From 1951 to June, 1963 he was Head of Labor Education at the University of Minnesota.

During World War II, it was government policy to encourage union organization in return for labor's support of the war. Companies had to have at least a "maintenance of membership" clause in their union agreements in order to be eligible for government contracts to produce planes, munitions and supplies to carry on the war. By the end of World War II, the total union membership was about 15 million. Now, 18 years later, the total U. S. union membership is barely 17 million. In 1946 the United Mine Workers Union conducted a strike which threatened to exhaust the coal supplies of many homes and cities unless it was settled. This created an "anti-labor" climate which helped elect a number of Congressmen who were pledged to cut back on the "powers" of unions. In 1947 Congress passed the Taft-Hartley Act, which drastically amended the Wagner Act of 1935 and slowed down the rate of union growth.

Jurisdictional disputes and raiding of membership by both AFL-and CIO unions also consumed much energy that could otherwise have gone toward organizing the unorganized. In 1953 the country elected a Republican president and the climate for union organization became even less favorable. A committee headed by Al Hayes, the President of the Machinists Union, made a study of the net effect of AFL-CIO membership "raiding" and found that in a two-year period prior to the merger in December 1955, about 44,000 union members had changed allegiance from the CIO to the AFL but that 40,000 had gone from the AFL to the CIO and over 4,000 had discontinued their union membership -- and at an organizing cost of nearly 12 million dollars. Both labor federations realized that it was costly and unproductive to remain divided and that in an unfriendly political climate a united effort was imperative.

While many of the early American unions were idealistic and often politically inspired, many of our unions in recent years have become "business" or "bread and butter" unions. A few of their leaders copied some of the practices which are common in the business community and became involved in charges of "racketeering". The president of one large union actually was sent to jail for misuse of union funds. The largest union in the AFL-CIO after the merger, the Teamsters' Union, was expelled because its leaders did not meet the standards of the ethical practice code adopted by the AFL-CIO. This reduced the AFL-CIO membership from approximately 15 million to 13.5 million. The total union membership in the United States is almost 17 million today. There are about 135 national unions within the federation and nearly 50 outside. The AFL-CIO is a member of the ICFTU (IBGF) and is giving increased support and attention to labor developments in other parts of the world. In commenting on a recently produced AFL-CIO film, "In Common Brotherhood", president George Meany said, "At the present time, our country is spending about 5 percent of its budget on foreign aid, and much of it is recovered through the purchase of goods and services in the United States. The AFL-CIO is spending nearly 25 percent of its income on the programs we have just seen (in the film), without the hope, the expectation or the desire of collecting a single cent in return."

While the individual unions concentrate on achieving job security and a better standard of living for their members through collective bargaining, the labor federations at the state and national levels concentrate on political and legislative action which they believe to be good for their members, their communities and their country. Thus they concern themselves with the "tax cut" proposed by the Democratic administration as a means to stimulate the economy and employment; they generally favor progressive income taxes rather than sales taxes; they support federal aid to education because they know that all children will have greater educational opportunities if education is adequately financed; they favor medical care for the aged (financed through our social security system), and they recognize the need for eliminating racial discrimination in jobs, in housing, voting, etc.

The assassination of President Kennedy caused many more Americans to become concerned about the "hate campaigns" that up until then were not generally taken seriously, just as Hitler was not always taken seriously during the 20's. While we have extremists from both the left and right, at this time the "right wing" has much more financial support and many more followers. Unions have recently begun "counter attacks" on extremist groups that call income taxes "a creation of Karl Marx", that imply unions are "communistic", that demand the impeachment of Supreme Court Chief Justice Earl Warren, etc.

Although American unions do not rely as heavily on the law and political action to accomplish their goals as German unions do, they realize that they have both an economic and a political function to perform. The former is usually performed by the individual unions and political action is a matter of united action through the labor federations at the local, state and national level. The great majority of union leaders and a substantial majority of the members, support the Democratic party and consider the Republican party to be the party which represents the interests of employers, doctors, etc.

Unemployment and inadequate economic growth are perhaps the most important domestic concern of American unions. For a number of years unemployment has hovered at about 5½ percent of the labor force, but with increasing automation and population growth, this percentage is likely to increase. It is estimated that an average of at least 2 million workers per year will be displaced by automation during the 1960's and that an average of another 1,350,000 workers per year will join the labor force as a result of population growth over and above the number who die or retire. This calls for imaginative and thoroughgoing programs if the number of unemployed is to be kept down. Other factors affecting the number and kinds of available jobs are the relationship between imports and exports, shifts from one product to another (such as glass to aluminum), and the effect of profit levels on consumer buying power.

While only 4 to 5 percent of the American economy is involved in imports and exports, and we generally export more than we import, workers in industries adversely affected by imports are still prone to urge policies which they think will protect their jobs. Many iron ore miners in Northern Minnesota believe that stopping the imports of ore from Venezuela and Canada would protect their jobs. Perhaps they are right, but there is no evidence that it would help the economy in general. What is needed, and what is beginning to take form, is legislation and a public policy for area re-development, manpower retraining, and re-location. Three acts have been passed by Congress in the last five years to help the economy and to eliminate unemployment in areas which have substantial unemployment rates, such as the iron ore region of Minnesota and the coal mining regions of Pennsylvania and West Virginia.

Automation has been largely responsible for a substantial drop in membership of the United Auto Workers Union, the Steelworkers Union, and many others. One of the changes that has taken place in the composition of the labor force is a drop in the number in agriculture and in industrial production, and an increase in sales, services, and government employment. American unions have not fully determined what goals and programs will attract the growing proportion of "white collar" workers into unions, yet they feel a need to adapt their programs to keep up with the changing complexion of the labor force.

Some employers have reconciled themselves to the fact that unions have certain rights under the law and are here to stay; others have continued their campaigns to restrict union activity. While it appears that the "right-to-work" drives in various states have lost momentum, union leaders believe they must be on the alert against their spreading to other states. At the federal level, it is not anticipated that further restrictive labor legislation will be enacted in the foreseeable future -- that is, as long as the Congress has a Democratic majority.

A number of national union leaders, such as Walter P. Reuther, James Carey, Arnold Zander, O. A. Knight, and Patrick Gorman, have spoken out vigorously against the reliance, primarily, on nuclear weapons to keep the peace, but most union leaders and members have not taken a forthright stand against nuclear war because they accept the traditional view that military strength prevents war, and also because they fear increased unemployment and loss of union membership if there should be a reduction in armament expenditures.

Before the Third Reich, Germany had over a hundred national unions; today it has 16 in the DGB and several outside the federation. The United States still has over 180 national unions, many of which are small, but which do represent workers in part of an industry. Consequently, there are many instances of overlapping jurisdiction. Instead of one Gewerkschaft Post, there are about a dozen postal unions. Instead of one GED, there are five "operating" railroad unions and 15 "non-operating" railroad unions. Instead of IG Metall, there are unions for auto workers, steelworkers, sheetmetal workers, boilermakers, electricians, plumbers, jewelry workers, etc. There are more than half a dozen printers' unions and textile unions instead of one Druck u. Papier and one Textil u. Bekleidung. In some instances unions in the same industry have merged in recent years, but in other cases they have retreated from the "marriage altar" because they could not agree on terms.

Discrimination against racial, religious and other minorities is not limited to any one country. Nevertheless, the United States, in the last few years, has had considerable strife stemming largely from the "awakening" and desire for equal rights on the part of the Negro population. Negroes make up about ten percent of the total population. They realize they have not been given their fair share of educational and job opportunities, decent housing, and the right to vote in the South. It is unrealistic to expect that the rank-and-file membership of unions should hold attitudes on race relations, or any other subject, which are much different from the rest of their communities. The Southern states have never accepted the spirit of the Constitutional amendments which were adopted after the Civil War (1861-1865) to give Negroes equal rights. Yet, insofar as leaders of most American unions are concerned, they have been in the forefront of the civil rights campaigns of recent years.

It must be remembered that there is no way to avoid discrimination when there are not enough jobs to go around. If a Negro gets a job, some white person will be unemployed. If a woman is hired, a man may be replaced. If a handicapped worker is employed, a man without a handicap may be jobless. Yet Union leaders recognize the waste and injustice of under-utilization of the skills of minority groups and are making a vigorous effort to minimize discrimination in jobs, housing, voting, use of public facilities, etc. In 1961, 5.7 percent of the white males in the civilian labor force were unemployed, while unemployment among non-white males was 12.9 percent. In 1962 professional and technical male workers made up 12.37 percent of employed persons, while non-whites had only 4.4 percent in this category.

Racketeering plays a very small part in the labor movement in the United States, but the few instances where it has occurred have been exploited by business and political leaders who would like to see unions with less strength and have created a situation which makes it more difficult to recruit new union members.

Unions are also plagued by lack of vigorous membership participation; in unions as in many other institutions and organizations in our society, most members do not take an active part. Attendance at union meetings usually runs between 2 and 10 percent, which means that many members merely have membership cards and know little about the organization to which they belong. Research studies on union member attitudes indicate, however, that a great majority do have favorable opinions toward their union. With low participation, it is difficult for unions to have common understanding and clearly defined goals, and one of the major concerns of leaders must then be how to get enough information to the membership so that there will be support for sound programs at the collective bargaining table, in Congress and the state legislatures, and during political campaigns.

A recent study by the education department of one national union showed that out of 100 local union officers and staff representatives, 82 favored a national health insurance program, 61 were for economic planning and 78 believed in the integration of the schools. The results were not so encouraging when the test of tolerance for points of view other than their own, was applied. Forty-one said Senator Goldwater (conservative Republican) should not be allowed to speak to union meetings; 61 said Communists should not be allowed to speak at public meetings; 48 said Socialists should not be allowed to teach social sciences in the schools; and 36 said Republicans should not be allowed to teach social sciences. It can be assumed that most of those who answered the questionnaire wanted their children exposed only to those who had a political and economic philosophy similar to their own.

The attitude of union workers in America toward Co-determination as practiced in Germany shows that the idea of workers being consulted on pricing and investment policies of the firm which employs them, is foreign to most of them. A research study of American unions, which was compared with a Fulbright research study conducted by the writer at the University of Cologne in 1959, showed American trade union members to be much more concerned about immediate goals of better wages and working conditions, seniority rights and job security. Generally, they did not want to be involved in the broader issues which have been historically considered the "prerogatives of management" in this country. All in all, much more remains to be explored and written concerning the similarities and differences of the American and German union movements.

ANNUAL REPORT: JULY 1, 1964 - JUNE 30, 1965

1965 Wisconsin State AFL-CIO Summer Institute on the campus of the University at Madison

June 27 – July 2

The School for Workers, University Extension Division, University of Wisconsin and the Wisconsin State AFL-CIO join in announcing this year's general institute to be held on the campus of the University at Madison. The institute is designed to provide union members and officers with intensive training in subjects related to the union's functions in the shop, on the job, in the community and in the world. Individual union members, shop stewards, committee men and women, and union officers are invited to attend. Many local unions and central labor bodies select and sponsor delegates to the institute.

The Institute begins with registration on Sunday afternoon, June 27, followed by a buffet supper and orientation meeting. The Institute concludes with a lunch and graduation on Friday noon, July 2.

Class Work

Participants will attend classes from 8:30 to 3:30 with breaks for coffee and lunch. In the morning, you will choose two from among the following classes:

- Contract Negotiations — the law of collective bargaining; the elements of the bargain; preparing for negotiations; building membership support; techniques of bargaining.
- Union Administration — increasing membership participation in all phases of the union's program; improving union meetings; developing effective committees; techniques for reaching the membership.
- Grievance Handling and Steward Training — the duties of the steward; recognizing grievances; investigating, preparing and presenting the case; writing grievances; the steward's larger role in the union.
- Job Evaluation — definitions and assumptions of job evaluation; the various systems; union attitudes; contract language and grievances under job evaluation.

In the afternoon, the choice will be one from among:

- Community Services — the role of the union in community affairs; learning about community agencies and their impact on the union member; developing a community services program in the local.
- "The Great Society," Problems and Prospects —analysis of the economic and social program of the current national administration.
- Time Study and Wage Incentives — definitions and assumptions of work measurement; steps in the establishment of a work standard; union attitudes; contract language and grievance handling.

SPECIAL EVENTS

In addition to the orientation supper and meeting on Sunday night and the Friday graduation lunch, two special evening programs will be offered as a regular part of the Institute schedule. These will bring speakers before the group to emphasize subjects which touch workers' lives as union members and citizens beyond the union's day-to-day operations. The Wednesday afternoon picnic is an Institute tradition.

INSTITUTE HEADQUARTERS . . . is located in Sullivan Hall in the northwest corner of the campus in Madison. It is here that you will report for final registration, live and take your meals.

THE INSTITUTE FEE . . . is $63.00. This covers room, meals, incidentals and tuition beginning with supper and lodging Sunday night through Friday lunch.

THE FACULTY . . . includes the regular staff of the School for Workers together with outstanding representatives from labor and the university. Staff members are available for counseling with individuals and groups on particular problems not covered in the regular classroom work.

RECREATIONAL OPPORTUNITIES . . . exist during free time in the late afternoons. Swimming, softball, volleyball, badminton, fishing, croquet and horseshoes can provide a break in the routine. Boat rides and sightseeing trips are arranged by the School's recreation director.

AFL-CIO Staff Institute on the Economics of Collective Bargaining

Full-time union officials and staff members are invited to take part in this institute which will be held in Madison from Sunday afternoon, August 1, through Friday, August 6. The School for Workers and the AFL-CIO Department of Research are the joint sponsors. Interested full-time union staff representatives may write for a descriptive leaflet to the School for Workers, University of Wisconsin Extension Division, 432 North Lake Street, Madison 6, Wisconsin.

Governor's Employment Conference

What actions can be taken to guarantee full utilization of California's manpower and productive resources?

This question was considered by top-ranking representatives of management, labor, government, and the academic community at the Governor's Conference on Employment, held September 30 to October 3 at Monterey.

Arranged by the Institute at the special request of Governor Edmund G. Brown, the four-day conference was designed to allow complete discussion of all aspects of the state's employment problems.

See pages 3 and 4 for the conclusions and recommendations of the Conference.

The 75 participants received extensive background material for advance study. At the conference, chaired by Institute Director Lloyd Ulman, they engaged in three days of round-table discussions and then met in plenary session the fourth day to issue a report.

An opening message from Governor Brown was delivered by State Finance Director Hale Champion. The Governor later attended several sessions of the conference and spoke briefly at a banquet on October 2, as did University President Clark Kerr.

Seminar Continues On Philosophy Of Management

The first Philosophy of Management seminar of the 1966 series is scheduled to take place next month.

Sponsored by the Institute and under the general direction of Professor Mason Haire, the seminars were started last year following the success of a Chancellor's dinner to which top-level Bay Area business leaders were invited to meet and talk with Dr. A. T. M. Wilson of Unilever, Ltd., who was then lecturing on the Berkeley campus.

Rather than being oriented to the mechanics of management techniques, the seminars concentrate on such central subjects as management's perceptions of its own nature and the social and economic functions which management can and should perform, as well as those which it perhaps should not attempt to perform.

The theme of the 1964–1965 series, the ideology of the firm and the society in which it is imbedded, included seminars on the constraints on freedom in a free economy, the ideal of individualism in business, the nature of the relationships between government and business, and the nature of the changing business ideology.

Background reading by the participants included The Business Establishment, edited by Earl F. Cheit; Capitalism and Freedom by Milton Friedman; The Human Side of Enterprise by Douglas McGregor; and Economic Development in Perspective by John Kenneth Galbraith.

William E. Rentfro Joins Institute As Coordinator of Labor Programs

Center Appoints Research Specialist

Sara Behman has joined the Institute's Community Services staff and will assume responsibility for directing research projects of the Labor Center.

Behman

A specialist in wage theory and labor market problems, Mrs. Behman holds a B.A. in Economics and an M.A. in Government Administration from the University of Pennsylvania. She expects to receive her Ph.D. in Economics from the University of California within a few months. Her dissertation is on "Wage Determination in a Cyclical Setting."

Mrs. Behman worked for 10 years as a labor market analyst for the California Department of Employment. She also served as a tax analyst for the California Senate Interim Committee on State and Local Taxation in 1949, and coauthored a report: Aggregate Property Tax Rates and Their Implications With Respect to Business Location and Development.

Mrs. Behman is also author of a paper published in the Review of Economic Studies (October, 1964) on "Labor Mobility, Increasing Labor Demand, and Money Wage-Rate Increases in United States Manufacturing."

William E. Rentfro, General Counsel for the Oil, Chemical, and Atomic Workers International Union, AFL-CIO, since 1955, has joined the staff of the Center for Labor Research and Education as Coordinator of Labor Programs.

He will fill the position left vacant by Herbert A. Perry, who is now on the faculty of Sacramento State College.

Rentfro received his law degree from the University of Colorado in 1948. He left private practice in 1951 to become Associate General Counsel and International Representative for the former CIO Oil Workers International Union.

Rentfro

Rentfro will specialize in developing and teaching courses in problems of collective bargaining, arbitration, and labor law and will conduct related research.

In announcing the appointment, Don Vial, Chairman of the Labor Center, noted that Rentfro has been responsible for directing the legal activities of the Oil Workers during the past 10 years. He has been involved in the full spectrum of union activities: collective bargaining, arbitration, strikes, and automation problems. He has handled litigation before state and federal courts and before the U.S. Supreme Court.

"Rentfro's knowledge and experience," Vial said, "will add great depth to the Center's activities."

In virtually all countries, there continued a gradual exodus from the agricultural to urban areas. Few cities, however, were able to provide adequate jobs, and the resulting urban poverty poses a serious problem for all countries.

International Organizations. In 1965, two major developments, both brought on by actions of the AFL-CIO, rocked the international labor movement. In March, at the AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting, President George Meany criticized the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) as being ineffective in combatting communism and "not effective in the developing countries." He threatened to reclaim over $1 million contributed by the AFL-CIO to the ICFTU Solidarity Fund for organizing and educating workers in the underdeveloped countries. Meany's annoyance stemmed from the fact that $4 million of the Fund has been invested in European banks rather than used in the field. ICFTU General Secretary Omer Becu pointed out that the present political situation in many developing countries made it impossible to carry out ICFTU programs in cooperation with national trade unions.

At the end of May, the AFL-CIO dropped its charge, but called for more attention to the developing countries. A second crisis developed in April when President Meany threatened to withdraw the AFL-CIO from participation in the International Labor Organization (ILO). Meany charged that the communist bloc countries were trying to turn the ILO into a "political propaganda group."

The issue was election of country representatives to the ten ILO industry committees, each concerning itself with a major occupational grouping. Of the 64 countries which announced their candidacy for positions on these committees, only eight, all communist countries, received no committee posts. In all, only three communist countries were elected. As a result of vehement protests by the communist bloc, ten new seats were created, seven of which were filled by communist countries. This action, charged Meany, altered the results of a free election. He dropped the threat of AFL-CIO withdrawal from the ILO on May 5, after consultation with top U.S. government officials who assured him that the AFL-CIO would be consulted on such matters before government policy was made on such questions in the future.

Africa. On the African continent, problems of unemployment and underemployment continued. Education, particularly vocational training, was emphasized to raise productivity of African workers and prepare them for new jobs. One particularly interesting approach was the founding of "national youth services," similar to the "Job Corps" of the U.S. anti-poverty program, designed to take unemployed youth off the streets and impart to them elementary skills. A beginning was made in social security insurance to aid the worker in his transition from a traditional tribal community to an urban, industrial labor force.

Trade union autonomy and collective bargaining remained controversial subjects, as the tradition of nonpartisan, independent trade unions bargaining freely with employers, came under increasing pressure in the drive for rapid economic development. President Jomo Kenyatta of Kenya banned all public meetings and demonstrations on behalf of trade unions competing with each other for members.

There has been an increasing trend toward compulsory arbitration in Africa on the grounds that it protects the public interest. Compulsory arbitration also allows the state to play an increasing role in economic planning by determining how the increased product of economic growth shall be divided among wages, profit, and capital investment.

Public works are being promoted in most African countries to provide employment and build up social overhead for economic expansion. Trade unions played an important role during 1965 in opposing undemocratic regimes in Sudan and Morocco. The military dictatorship of Ibrahim Abboud in Sudan was ousted by strikes and demonstrations, in which workers from the capitol city of Khartoum played a leading role. In Morocco, the Moroccan Federation of Labor (UMT) staged a sympathy strike throughout the country in support of the demands of high school students that the government rescind a cutback in the education budget. The pressure exerted by this strike, in which 25 were killed by government police, forced the regime of King Hassan to include participation of more popular elements in his government.

The continuing problem of minority racial rule in southern Africa was underscored by an ILO resolution June 23, condemning Portugal's use of forced labor in its African colonies, Angola and Mozambique. In South Africa, the shortage of white skilled labor had become so acute that employers were permitted to hire African workers experimentally for skilled and semi-skilled jobs previously "reserved" by law for white workers. Africans have performed the work satisfactorily, but pressure from white workers and their unions forced the government to curb such "experimentation" in the mines.

Asia. The need for jobs and purchasing power continued to be Asia's most basic labor problem. The Indonesian-Malaysian dispute had ramifications for the trade unions of both countries during 1965. In January the Federation of Moslem Trade Unions in Indonesia left the ICFTU over the latter's resolution on the dispute, alleging a lack of understanding for the Indonesian position. In May the Malaysian government banned strikes in essential services. Japan continued to enjoy the prosperous living standards and the highest rate of economic growth in Asia. Labor contracts moved in the direction of a 40-hour five-day week. During the first part of the year, Japanese trade unions pressured the Japanese Diet for ratification of ILO Convention 87 which guarantees the right of workers to organize trade unions of their own choice. The Diet confirmed the Convention on May 17.

An example of the efforts to develop social security for Asian workers was the new law which went into effect in Iraq on Oct. 10, 1964, covering sickness, pensions, and employment injuries. The law was drafted with the assistance of the ILO and UN technical assistance personnel.

Europe. The most pressing labor problem in Europe is a growing labor shortage, while developing countries suffer greatly from unemployment and underemployment. The six member nations of the European Common Market estimated at the beginning of 1965 that there were 800,000 jobs open for which employees could not be found. This shortage continued despite the most extensive migration in European history. Over the past five years, over 5 million workers have moved into higher paying jobs in central Europe, Britain, and Scandinavia. These countries have exhausted their labor reserves, so that now only foreign labor can satisfy the demand. Italy alone has 2.5 million citizens working in other parts of Europe. France has many foreign workers from North Africa and Britain has many from the Commonwealth countries. Germany and Switzerland are both approaching foreign work forces of one million. In Switzerland this constitutes about 30 percent of the entire labor force. Switzerland has begun to compel employers to reduce the number of foreign employees, fearing that the country's culture and traditions will be changed by the influx of workers from abroad. Luxemburg, faced with a declining population, now has about 45 percent foreign workers.

In Great Britain, the Labour Party government undertook measures to slow wage and price increases, to correct a serious imbalance of payments.

In France, President deGaulle aimed at a similar policy of wage and price restraint.

Latin America. The Sixth Continental Congress of the ICFTU affiliate, ORIT, was held in Mexico City in February. It pointed to unemployment as the main problem for Latin American Labor which it related to the rapid increase in population and the low level of industrialization. Because half of the labor force is in agriculture, and modern techniques are used mainly in the export sector, great investment, estimated at $8 billion by 1975, will be needed to provide employment opportunities in the industrial sector. ORIT is the largest of the international federations with 29 organizations in 22 countries of Latin America. The World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) through its new arm, CUTAL (Central Unica de Trabajadores de American Latina) and the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions (CLASC) represent a much smaller proportion of organized workers.

Roosevelt University was founded in 1945 to provide opportunity for learning and teaching in conditions of freedom and equality. It was founded in controversy over basic issues of democracy and freedom. From the beginning it has had strong support from the American Labor movement.

The Labor Education Division has equal status with the other schools in the University: Arts and Sciences, Business, and Music. The first director of the Labor Education Division, Frank W. McCullough, is the present Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board. President E. J. Sparling, founding President of the University, has always been a strong supporter of labor education in a university setting.

The Board of Trustees and Advisers includes Walter Reuther, Morris Bialis, Patrick Gorman, Jacob Potofsky, David Dubinsky, Adlai Stevenson, Ralph Bunche, and the late Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt. The University library is named after Philip Murray and William Green who were advisers.

The office workers and all maintenance employees have a union shop and there is a local of the American Federation of Teachers at the University. The University has an unusual interest in serving the labor movement as well as other segments of our democratic society. We welcome your participation in the spirit of training for better union service.

KOHLER ON STRIKE

THIRTY YEARS OF CONFLICT

$7.50

Never in the history of American industrial life has there been a labor-management conflict which lasted so long, cost so much and engendered so much bitterness as the two strikes at the Kohler Company.

KOHLER ON STRIKE

records the events that plagued the Village of Kohler and Sheboygan County for much of three decades. Vividly describing the conflict in goals between labor and management, Walter Uphoff portrays the paternalistic, well-intentioned, family-owned company which expected to govern the lives of its employees, and alone determine wages, define working conditions and health benefits. Facing this employer was a growing number of workers who turned to outside unions — first an AFL federal labor union and then the United Automobile Workers — for help in achieving the collective bargaining rights spelled out by national legislation.

Out of this conflict came two strikes, two workers killed and 47 wounded in the first strike, extensive "military" preparations by the company before both strikes, mass picketing, vandalism and violence committed by individual strikers and nonstrikers, and a community split apart. The roles of local, state and federal governments in their attempts to mediate, the processing of allegations of unfair labor practices and the effect of the decisions of various courts are carefully described. The book is documented by testimony from both sides, newspaper articles, transcripts of government hearings and many photographs. In fact, Kohler On Strike allows us to understand what was happening during the endless days of crisis as even the participants could not.

With the hope that what was learned during the long struggle will be used in the future development of labor relations, the author has given us what will undoubtedly be seen as the definitive account of this classic clash between management and organized labor.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

WALTER H. UPHOFF, who grew up near Kohler, in Sheboygan County, Wisconsin, has maintained — through years of work in labor relations — a continuing interest in the Kohler problem. The first strike, its socioeconomic causes and effects, was the subject of his master's thesis at the University of Wisconsin, where he later joined the faculty. Now Professor of Economics and Director of Labor Education at the University of Colorado, he has also taught at the University of Minnesota. A teacher of labor education classes for trade unionists, joint classes for labor and management, courses of labor and industrial relations for university students, Walter Uphoff has frequently been consulted regarding the settlement of grievances and the negotiation of contracts.

Advance comments from a United States Senator:

"Professor Uphoff has shaped into a readable persuasive form the passions, agonies and the conflicts surrounding the long Kohler Company strike. He holds back no judgments on the actions of either the Kohler management or the striking United Auto Workers. In the field of labor relations, his book will assume the stature already attained in the field of sociology at large by the Lynds' Middletown." — ROBERT F. KENNEDY

A reporter who covered the strike:

"Walter Uphoff's book offers an objective, well-documented analysis of the two Kohler strikes and restores a clear perspective to what feuding parties and frantic headlines transformed into a horrible blur. His scholarly research, his unflagging efforts to bring in the views of participants on all sides, his skill in distilling essential facts out of mountains of information and misinformation, and his lucid writing have transformed what could be a dry recital into a most interesting one." — CARL FIEDLER, The Sheboygan Press

A priest who served as a mediator:

"The recently concluded Kohler strike was more than a unique labor-management dispute. It was a tragic drama of a community divided by strife and bitterness. Professor Uphoff gives us a fascinating portrait of the entire struggle." — REV. JOHN F. CRONIN, S.S., National Catholic Welfare Conference

A labor educator:

"The author has spent a good portion of his life involved in studying, thinking and writing about his subject. Kohler On Strike shows this intimacy. The book is a moving, authoritative and important work, not only for the specialist but for anyone who is interested in the causes of industrial 'war' and 'peace.' " — FRED K. HOEHLER, JR., United Steelworkers of America

An industrial relations scholar:

"Here is a book of carefully documented history that achieves all the fascination of a great novel. That is possible only because the author has combined a deep, persistent, day-by-day yet detached, non-participant, probing interest in every dramatic episode of this thirty-year struggle. The total report reads like the observations of an experienced war correspondent, who records and interprets this sequence of events and demonstrates that truth is indeed both stranger and more intriguing than fiction." — DALE YODER, Stanford University

THE UNION LEADERSHIP PROGRAM

The Ohio State University
LABOR EDUCATION AND RESEARCH SERVICE
College of Commerce and Administration

THE UNION LEADERSHIP PROGRAM

A UNIVERSITY LEVEL PROGRAM FOR UNION OFFICERS AND HIGHLY MOTIVATED MEMBERS

Why are many union members apathetic as far as their unions are concerned?

What's the difference between effective leadership and holding an office?

Why is organized labor receiving sharp criticism from the American public and what can be done about it?

Is the worker's fear of automation and foreign competition justified?

Union leaders are frequently confronted by many questions arising from their responsibilities to the union, to themselves, and to the public. Sometimes the questions have simple answers; most of the time they are complex, involving people with different ideas and attitudes or relationships that are vague and complicated. Yet a leader is expected to provide the answers and solutions – if he didn't he wouldn't be a leader.

While there is no way that a leader can always come up with the right answers, education increases the chance that he will. Education includes knowledge of the ideas of people who may have spent years, even lifetimes, searching for the answers to a few questions. Thus, education provides the means whereby someone, such as yourself, can profit from the findings, ideas, and experiences of others without making the same costly investment.

Because we believe there are many union leaders (both officers and active members may be leaders) in the State of Ohio who want to do a better job in their unions, and gain the respect and position that rightfully goes to one who does a better job, the Union Leadership Program was developed by the Labor Education and Research Service and is now offered in a number of Ohio cities.

The Union Leadership Program consists of a selected group of nine courses that are designed to meet the educational needs of union leaders. Two-hour classes taughts by instructors who are well-qualified to work with adults, meet one night each week, for twenty-four weeks in a year. Each participant has the opportunity to complete three courses each year. The entire program spans a three-year period, at the end of which a certificate of accomplishment is awarded. However, the successful completion of two years or even one year may enable a person to acquire skills and ideas that will be of value throughout a lifetime.

The fee for the program is $55 per year; this includes all costs to the participants, including books and materials. The fee may be paid either by the individual or the local union, should it choose to sponsor one or more participants as many locals have done.

If you wish to apply for the Union Leadership Program, send the attached application to the Labor Education and Research Service as soon as possible.

COURSE DESCRIPTIONS

The courses described below are offered in each Labor Education Center but not necessarily in the following order.

ECONOMICS

The study of the structure and functioning of the American economic system. In the process of developing economic ideas, concepts, and models, this course includes consideration of such questions as the causes and consequences of unemployment, business fluctuations, foreign trade and technological change. Also examined are the role and significance of government regulations and intervention, and private associations such as the trade union.

SOCIOLOGY

This course deals with the structure and functioning of society. Beginning with the concept of the "group," the concept of society is analyzed in terms of institutions, such as the economy, the family, religion, and government. The course also deals with the manner in which society regulates and influences its component parts such as trade unions.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

The investigation and analysis of various aspects of collective bargaining in terms of employers' and unions' attempts to achieve goals within certain legal and economic frameworks. This course includes consideration of such matters as specific bargaining issues, bargaining tactics and strategies, contract administration, grievance procedure, arbitration, wages and wage theories.

POLITICAL SCIENCE

The course in political science deals with the structure and functioning of American national, state and local governments. Consideration is given to the relationship between government and widely held political attitudes, factors which influence the legislative, executive and judicial processes, and the role of political parties and pressure groups in their contemporary setting.

COMPARATIVE POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC SYSTEMS

This course deals with the structure and functioning of different economic and political systems which today are important in the world. Contrasted and evaluated are democratic and authoritarian types of governments and free market and centrally directed economies.

UNION LEADERSHIP: A CASE STUDY IN SOCIAL PSYCHOLOGY

This course deals with relationships among people. Specifically, questions such as these are considered: Why do people belong to groups and organizations? To what extent and in what directions can members of groups and organizations be led? And, how do leaders function? Also considered are such group and organizational problems as apathetic members and changing goals.

LABOR LAW: THE LAW OF COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

The study of common and statutory law, and their interpretation by courts and the NLRB. This course deals with the legal implications of the institution of collective bargaining as it relates to employers, employees, and their representatives. Some specific issues dealt with are (1) the workers' right to combine and bargain collectively, (2) good faith bargaining, (3) employer unfair labor practices, and (4) union unfair labor practices.

COMPLEX ORGANIZATIONS

This course deals with the manner in which large organizations function with special emphasis upon the behavior of the individuals who staff them. Other topics included in this course are systems of control within organizations, the organization's impact on the individual's personality, and deviant behavior in a society made up of complex organizations.

LABOR HISTORY AND CONTEMPORARY PROBLEMS

This course begins with the emergence of unionism in the U. S. in the 19th Century, traces its development to the present, and ends with examination and analysis of problems for unionism observable today. Included in this is an attempt to assess the past, present, and expected impact of unionism upon the American industrial relations environment.

THE OHIO STATE UNIVERSITY LABOR EDUCATION AND RESEARCH SERVICE

The Labor Education and Research Service has been established to (1) make available university-level education programs for workers and their organizations, and (2) promote and conduct research and materials development projects in the area of labor and industrial relations to support and improve the quality of labor education.

EDUCATION

In addition to the Union Leadership Program, described in this brochure, other educational programs offered by the Service include special short courses meeting one night each week for six to ten weeks and conferences offered either on the university campus in Columbus or in other areas of the state. A variety of subjects have been included in such programs, including the following: grievance procedure; time and motion study and job evaluation; steward training; local union administration; union organization and structure; labor history; economic and social problems; and governmental and political issues of importance to labor. Usually, the costs are low, varying with the size of the group and the amount of instruction and materials required. The Service also conducts one-week summer schools on the university campus in cooperation with national, regional, and state labor organizations.

RESEARCH

In its research activities, The Labor Education and Research Service has conducted a number of projects in the area of labor and industrial relations, including studies of union members' attitudes, practices of union officers, determinants of union members' loyalties to their unions, union democracy, unionists' views toward labor education, and the development of appropriate reading materials for use in labor education programs. (A list of publications will be furnished upon request).

UNION ADMINISTRATION QUESTIONNAIRE

This questionnaire asks a great many questions about your local union. It asks a few questions about you. The purpose of the questionnaire is to help in teaching the course on union administration. It should give an idea as to what are the troublesome problems and strong points in your local's operation. Also, it may suggest activities or approaches to problems that will interest you -- in any case, these can be discussed in class.

Most of the questions can be answered in the blanks with a simple "yes" or "no" or by checking the appropriate box. A few questions require your best estimate as to a number or a percentage. Some questions require a brief comment.

In some cases you may not know the answer: if this happens, just write "don't know" or simply put "D.K.".

If there is anything that is not clear, feel free to ask for an explanation.

POLITICAL PARTICIPATION

1. Does your local endorse candidates for political office? _____

   Local? _____ State? _____ National? _____

2. Does the local take part in a register-to-vote campaign? _____

3. What percentage of your local members are registered? _____

4. Does the local keep up-to-date records on its members as to whether they are registered? _____

5. Does the local urge members to vote? _____ Is there a campaign? _____

6. Do candidates for office speak at local union meetings? _____

7. Does the local get reports on legislative issues? _____ Does it report which way the representatives in your area voted on particular bills?_____

8. Are letters written to legislators by the local?_____ By members at the urging of the local?_____Are legislators visited so that the local's political interests may be made known? _____

9. Does the local collect money for political or political education purposes? _____

10. Are the members "against" the local being in politics?_____

11. Do members' wives oppose the local being in politics? _____

12. Does the community in general oppose the union's being in politics? _____

13. Do any of your members hold political office?_____What?_____

14. What political issues have been presented to the local union in the last year? _____

15. What percentage of your members make a contribution to C.O.P.E., a political candidate, or to some other political activity?_____

FIGURING THE COST OF FRINGE BENEFITS

The following formulas tell you how to figure the cost of fringe benefits. The tables which give you costs figured from the formulas are close approximations. However, if precision is important it is better to work your costs out directly from the formulas.

All figures are based on a 40 hour week for 52 weeks (2080 hours). Overtime does not enter into figuring fringe benefit costs.

Holidays, Sick Pay, Vacations, Funeral Leave, etc.

General Formula:

(1) $$\frac{2080}{2072} - 1 = .003861$$

Note 1: This is a figure that can be used in computing the cost of any number of days off with pay by substituting in the following formula (2). It can be rounded to .0039. The formula tells us that if a man is paid for 2080 hours but works only 2072 (in other words, he has one day off with pay) the cost to the company for the hours worked is greater. In the case of one day off it is .003861 times his hourly wage.

To figure the cost of the paid holiday program use the following formula:

(2) .003861 x straight time hourly wage x no. of holidays = cost/hr.

Note 2: The straight time hourly rate should be the average wage for the whole bargaining unit. This is gotten by adding the straight time hourly wage of each employee and dividing by the number of employees.

$$\frac{\text{Total of straight time hourly wage of each employee}}{\text{No. of employees}} = \text{Average straight time for the bargaining unit.}$$

Example 1: John Jones works for $1.50 per hour and gets six paid holidays annually. We want to know how much it costs the company for each hour John Jones works.

.00386 x 1.50 x 6 = .0347

1.50 .0347 = 1.5347 or approximately 1.53½ cents per/hour.

Example 2: We know that in the plant where John Jones works some people receive more pay than he does and some receive less. From the list of hourly rates the company has given us for collective bargaining we find that the following are the rates paid:

Rate	No. of Employees	Rate x No.
1.75	10	17.50
1.60	20	32.00
1.50	30	45.00
1.40	20	28.00
1.25	10	12.50
Total	90	135.00

$$\text{Average Hourly Wage} = \frac{135.00}{90} = 1.50$$

Substituting in formula (2) as in example (1) we find that the hourly cost for the company's holiday program is .0347 per hour or approximately 3½ cents per hour.

To figure the cost of paid vacations use the following formula:

(3) .003861 x straight time hour rate x no. of days of paid vacation = cost/hour for vacation.

Note 3: When you want the average cost for the whole bargaining unit you will have to multiply the rate of pay for each employee x the number of days vacation for that employee. Multiplying average figures will not give you the correct figure. In order to find this information you will need the complete seniority listing.

Example 3: In plant X there are 20 employees. They receive one week (5 days) of paid vacation after 1 year with the company and two weeks (10 days) of vacation after 3 years with the company. Using the seniority list and rages of pay furnished by the company we find the following:

(A) No. of days of paid vacation	(B) Average hourly rate	(C) No. of employees	(A) x (B) x (C)
10	1.70	5	10x 1.70x 5 = 85.00
10	1.50	2	10x 1.50x 2 = 30.00
10	1.40	3	10x 1.40x 3 = 42.00
5	1.75	1	5x 1.75x 1 = 8.75
5	1.45	3	5x 1.45x 3 = 21.75
5	1.30	6	5x 1.30x 6 = 39.00
			Total 226.50

$$\frac{226.50 \text{ (no. days vacation x rate of pay for each employee)}}{20 \text{ (No. of employees)}} = 11.31$$

11.31 x .003861 = .0437 or slightly over 4 cents per hour cost for the vacation program.

To figure the cost of Sick leave, funeral pay, etc.:

Use the same formula (2) as you use for paid holidays. Instead of using "no. of holidays" use the average days lost as a result of sickness not paid for by some other plan. For example, if your health and welfare plan starts paying sick leave after the sixth day, it would make the figure larger than it should be if you took the average days lost per year due to sickness. You must request a precise breakdown from the company if you wish to figure this cost. If the company uses the cost argument you can request their figures. The same holds for funeral leave or other leaves that depend on variable conditions.

Note: The experience figures of any one company are unstable from year to year. For example, if there is a flu epidemic the cost of paid sick leave may be higher for that year than for another year.

Figuring from a Table

For quick and fairly precise figures on cost use Table I. (See Page 8)

Figuring paid holidays:

We know that the average wage is $1.50 an hour and that the company grants 6 days paid vacation. We go down the column that is headed "Hourly Pay" until we reach "1.50". We than go across to the column headed "6" for number of days. We find the average hourly cost of 6 days paid vacation to the company is .0347 or approximately 3½ cents per hour.

The cost of an added day of vacation could be figured very easily. Follow the same procedure. Go down the column headed "hourly pay" to "1.50". We then go to the column headed "1" and we find the added cost of one day vacation to be .0058 or approximately 6/10 of a cent per hour.

If we wish to know the total cost of 7 days vacation for a unit whose average wage is $1.50 an hour we can add:

$$\begin{array}{r} .0058 \\ \underline{.0347} \\ .0405 \end{array}$$ or approximately .04 per hour for 7 days vacation.

Although 2.10 is not on the table, if we wish to know the cost of vacations for individuals making 2.10 an hour, we can add the figures we find under 1.00 and 1.10 and have the answer.

Example 4. John Jones makes $2.50 an hour and get 7 days vacation with pay. What is the company's cost for the hours worked by John Jones?

Reading from the table we go down the column headed "hourly rate" and choose any two figures that equal $2.50.

We will choose: 1.20 and 1.30

Since we only have up to six days on the table we will have to choose from the columns headed "no. of days" two columns that will total 7.

We will choose 3 and 4

Using the table we get the following figures:

$1.20 for 3 days	.0139
$1.20 for 4 days	.0185
$1.30 for 3 days	.0151
$1.30 for 4 days	.0201
Total	.0676

We find the cost of 7 days vacation for a man making $2.50 per hour is .0676 or approximately 6-3/4 cents per hour.

Note 4: You can use any combination that adds to the total you want. Some combinations will differ slightly from others but not enough to be concerned about.

Figuring vacations:

The same technique applies as in figuring holidays. You must, however, look up each individual on the seniority list and find the individual cost. Add each of these costs and divide by the total no. of individuals.

As a short cut, however, if you have for example, 10 men receiving 10 days of vacation - you find the cost for 1 man and multiply by 10. DO NOT FORGET TO ADD THE FIGURE OF 10 TO TOTAL NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES WHEN YOU FIGURE THE AVERAGE.

Example 5: We will use the figures in example 3.

We know that 5 men making 1.70 receive 10 days vacation. In the table we look up 1.70 for 6 and 4 days (= 10 days) and add the figures

$$\begin{array}{r} .0263 \\ \underline{.0392} \\ .0655 \end{array}$$

Since this is the cost for one man and we want the average we multiply this by 5 (the number of men who make the money and receive the same amount of vacation). Because not all men work under these conditions we must work through the rest of our table in the same way.

The figures we get are as follows:

$$\begin{array}{rcrcr} .0655 & \times & 5 & = & .3275 \\ .0579 & \times & 2 & = & .1158 \\ .0540 & \times & 3 & = & .1620 \\ .0338 & \times & 1 & = & .0338 \\ .0280 & \times & 3 & = & .0840 \\ .0251 & \times & \underline{6} & = & \underline{.1506} \\ & & 20 & & .8737 \end{array}$$

$$\frac{.8737}{20} = .0437 \text{ or slightly over 4 cents per hour cost}$$

Note 5: The figure may not be quite the same as when we figure the long way as in Example 3. This difference is slight and results from slight inaccuracies from the use of the table. The cost will not always be greater when figured from the table. Sometimes it will be slightly less depending on the wage figures and no. of days.

Figuring other paid leave:

The same technique applies as when figuring holidays. Remember the exceptions stated in the paragraph "Figuring sick pay, funeral pay, etc.

NOTE: If you have a wage rate that isn't listed in the table, for example, 1.67 and you wish to find the cost for 4 days of paid leave - an approximate figure can be gotten by looking up 1.65 (.0255) and 1.70 (.0263) and taking a figure about half way between (.0259).

Health and Welfare & Pension Plans

The cost per hour of health & welfare plans or any other benefit with a fixed dollar value is very easy to compute. The cost per employee per year is divided by 2080, the number of hours in a work year.

Company "A" pays 5 dollars a month or 60 dollars a year toward the health and welfare program of the employees. The cost per hour is:

$\frac{$60.00}{2080 \text{ hours}}$ or .0289 or approximately 3 cents per hour

Example 6: Company "A" is in negotiations. The Union is asking for 2.00 a month added contribution. The cost to the company per hour is:

$\frac{$24.00}{2080 \text{ hours}}$ or .0115 or approximately 1 and 1/10 cents per hr.

NOTE: In many pension plans workers are not covered until they have been with the company a number of years. In this case the cost per hour is decreased.

Example 7: Company "A" has pension plans to which it contributes 5.00 per month for every employee who has been with the company 5 years or more. Half its employees have been with the company 5 years or more. The cost per hour to the company is:

$1/2 \times \frac{60.00}{2080 \text{ hours}}$ or .0144 per hour or approximately $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per hour.

OTHER COMPUTATIONS

Rest Periods

In some cases the company may consider rest periods a cost item. In many shops this is not a legitimate cost item because the shop is not closed down for rest periods and there are no special relief men.

Even if the shop is closed or men stop their machines for rest period, it is not a necessarily legitimate cost item since some studies have shown that production is not decreased by giving rest periods.

If the employer includes the cost of rest periods, multiply the number of minutes in rest periods for each day by the number of working days and divide by 480 (the number of minutes in an 8 hour work day) and then apply the same procedure as for holidays.

Total Cost of Fringe Benefits

At times you might wish to figure the total cost of fringe benefits. This can be figured by multiplying the total cost per hour of the average number of employees times 2080. The average number of employees, to be accurate, must be gotten from the company since the work force changes over the year.

If you want only the total cost and not the cost per hour some obvious short cuts can be taken. For example, health and welfare payments, and pensions may be fixed per employee cost. Cost of holidays, vacations, etc., will not have to be reduced to hourly cost but can be left in cost per day.

For Example: The total cost of holidays can be gotten by Average rate of pay x no. of employees x no. of paid holidays x 8 hours.

Percentage of Labor Costs Paid in Fringe Benefits

The percentage of total labor cost can be figured by the following:

$$\frac{\text{Total cost of fringe benefits}}{\text{Total labor cost}}$$

If the pay for time off is included the percentage will be higher than if only straight time worked is used for figuring the percentage.

The percentage will vary depending on what goes into total labor cost. Total cost can be figured using:

(1) Total, including pay for time off - in this memo we use pay excluding pay for time off, but do not use overtime hours.

(2) Arbitrary number of hours - in this work sheet we use 2080 hours as a full work year.

(3) Straight time hours worked.

(4) Pay for scheduled work hours.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

I. Introduction

A. The union contract as a form of government

A labor contract acts as a "law and order" document. It eliminates arbitrary procedures of management by introducing a relationship between employers and employees. The contract establishes an "industrial citizenship". The divine and arbitrary right of employers to deal out justice and determine conditions of work and pay gives way to a system of jointly agreed upon rules and procedures.

B. The scope of collective bargaining

In practice, collective bargaining includes the whole range of human relationships surrounding and including the recognition of the union, negotiations for agreements, the relationship in the shop or office, strikes and lockouts, as well as the increased consideration of problems of common concern to employees and management.

Collective bargaining is substantially more than the written agreement and grievance machinery which it provides. These instruments may exist and the collective bargaining relationship may still be unsatisfactory. A successful collective bargaining relationship hinges on the continued ability and willingness of the parties to recognize their mutual responsibilities, to understand the reasons for the actions of the other party, and to carry out their responsibilities with a clear sense of justice for all individuals involved.

C. Management rights

Management rights have been defined by common law. Usually these rights involved directing the work force, disciplining employees, setting up rules and regulations for efficient operation of the business, determining the products to be manufactured, etc. The development of broader social outlook by unions has through the years broadened the area of collective bargaining. Today, there appears to be a good basis for unions' concern with business practices, for example, pricing. Labor gets blamed for price increases because of negotiated pay raises. This suggests that labor in negotiations should be concerned with broader economic and business issues.

D. The labor contract as a unit

In negotiating a union contract, the contract must always be thought of as a unit rather than a series of provisions. One clause may have the effect of nullifying another. For example, a no strike clause may make it impossible to strike over economic issues if re-opening or termination clauses are not properly worded.

Collective Bargaining

II. Techniques in Collective Bargaining

No single formula for collective bargaining can be developed which will apply properly in all cases because of widely varying conditions and specific history of negotiations. Generally, however, some approaches can be applied in modified form to most negotiations.

A. Preparations for negotiations

In many cases the union will prepare a set of contract proposals for changes which will be presented to the company either before negotiations or at the first negotiating session. The company may also draw up a list of proposals for contract changes.

1. In preparing proposed changes the following questions should be asked:

   a. Do these proposals include the changes important for correcting difficulties that arose under the past contract. This can be determined by studying the grievances filed under the current contract and by asking for suggestions at Steward Council or membership meetings.

   b. Have new clauses been added to adapt the contract to changing conditions. For example, if the company is planning job evaluation or time study -- are there provisions to protect the workers now on the job? Will new equipment be introduced?

   c. Are the demands reasonable?

   d. Can the demands be backed with sound arguments?

2. Facts should be in the hands of the negotiating committee to back up their demands.

   a. As many facts as possible on wages and working conditions in comparable industries both locally and throughout the nation.

   b. Employees average hourly earnings. (In this section are excerpts from an article by Max Miller giving the employers responsibilities for supplying this information.)

   c. Figures on the cost of living both nationally and for the particular area.

   d. The laws, decrees, and regulations, both Federal and State, which may affect the negotiations.

Collective Bargaining

B. Methods of procedure during negotiations

1. The negotiating committee
The committee should be completely familiar with all the demands and the conditions in the plant which lead to these demands. As much as possible they should have an understanding of the complete operation of the company.

2. The spokesman for the committee
One individual should be designated as the spokesman. This will probably be the union representative, business agent, or one of the officers of the union.

3. Procedures during negotiation meetings

aa. If the company presents formal proposals, ask for a recess to study them. After the recess raise any questions you may have.

b. Be prepared to go through your own proposals explaining them point by point.

c. The committee members should always follow the lead of their spokesman. If there are any misunderstandings or disagreements among the committee, a recess should be asked for. The committee should always present a united front.

d. When legal questions arise that the committee is not sure about, it should request time to consult the union's attorney.

e. Early in negotiations retroactivity to date of contract expiration should be agreed upon (if no settlement is reached by the expiration date).

f. Avoid deadlock if possible.

4. The final draft of contract
The final draft should be studied carefully before signing. If there have been major changes in wording, it might be wise to have the union attorney check it.

C. Human relations in negotiations

1. Conduct negotiation meetings in a courteous, firm and business-like manner.

2. Insist that all discussion be carried on in a factual objective manner.

3. Refrain from deadlock if possible.

4. Keep heat and passion out of discussions as much as possible Abusive language and anger quite often put the committee at a disadvantage.

Collective Bargaining

5. The committee should always be willing to listen, giving management complete opportunity to express their point of view. By listening and asking questions, the committee may learn facts that will help them in negotiations.

D. Interpreting changes in the contract to stewards and membership

If the contract is to be successfully enforced, it is necessary that the members understand the changes completely. If the changes are extensive, it may be necessary to hold a number of sessions to interpret the changes to the stewards. Care should be taken in putting the new contract into action.

III. Bargaining for Wages

A. Prevailing wages in craft and industry

One approach is to present information showing that the demands presented are justified in the light of what similar industries are paying for similar jobs. Wage information can be gotten from various sources.

1. If your international union research department does analysis of contracts in effect, it can provide information on prevailing rates and benefits.

2. The AFL-CIO Research Department publishes Collective Bargaining Reports monthly which summarizes wage data.

3. The Bureau of Labor Statistics publishes wage surveys for the larger industrial centers around the country. These surveys have limited value since they average both union and non-union wages.

4. For some industries the Bureau of Labor Statistics publishes surveys on union wages.

5. Minnesota State Civil Service Department publishes an annual wage survey for the State of Minnesota.

6. Employer associations and trade associations do wage surveys in particular industries for specific areas. If the employer uses such a survey in negotiations, he is required to present the union with a copy.

7. Monthly publications. Monthly Labor Review published by Bureau of Labor Statistics and Employment and Earnings published by the Manpower Division of the Department of Labor gives average wages for each industry.

Collective Bargaining

B. Wage Increases granted in your craft and industry

Often it is simpler and more effective to present wage raises granted in similar industries to back up your demand for wage increases. This does not make it necessary to consider individual job classifications. Also, if you are leading some of the company's competitors, arguing for equivalent wage raise permits you to keep your relative position in the industry.

1. Bureau of Labor Statistics publishes information on wage increases negotiated. It also publishes Wage Chronologies--summaries of collective bargaining gains for single companies over long periods of time.

2. The AFL-CIO Collective Bargaining Report also publishes information on wage increases in collective bargaining agreements.

C. Cost of living and family budget increases

Increases in cost of living may be an effective argument for wage increases. The standard measure for cost of living increases is the Consumer Price Index. Cost of living increases (if you don't have escalator clauses in your contract) may prove to be effective in backing up wage demands. The CPI, however, does not give you actual cost of living but rather increases in cost. This limits the value of the CPI for collective bargaining purposes.

The City Worker's Family Budget developed by the Bureau of Labor Statistics in 1947 gives actual cost of a "modest but adequate" budget. This was adjusted by the Bureau in 1951 to reflect some of the changes in spending patterns. An appropriate adjustment can be made with CPI data to bring it up to date.

The Consumer Price Index can be gotten free each month by writing the Bureau of Labor Statistics, Washington, D.C.

D. Productivity

It is very difficult to use increased productivity per man hour as an argument for increased wages unless some pronounced changes in production methods have been adopted. Throughout industry productivity has increased steadily, but it is difficult for a union negotiating committee to make a case for increases productivity in its own firm.

E. Financial position of the company

In large companies where financial statements are published or stock dividends declared, it is possible to use this information.

If the company pleads inability to pay and consequently produces its financial statement, it is important to know how to interpret the statement in order to bargain wisely on this point.

Collective Bargaining

IV. Bargaining for Economic Fringe Benefits

Fringe benefits are considered as cost items and consequently bargained for in conjunction with wages. The strongest arguments are prevailing conditions in the industry. Whether fringe benefits are taken instead of wage increases depends in part on the desires of the members and in part on long range goals and policies of the union.

Some of these benefits are: vacations, holiday pay, premium pay, sick pay, leaves of absence, shift differentials, call-in or report-time pay, guaranteed employment.

V. Job Evaluation and Time Study in the Contract

Management rights: Management generally insists it has the right to use any method of setting job classifications and setting production standards. The actual procedures used may be determined by management without consulting the union. The union, however, becomes involved when workers are unjustly treated.

Union policy: There have been great differences between unions on their views toward job evaluation and time study. The needle trades unions, for example, have cooperated with management as partners in setting up incentive systems based on time study, whereas the International Association of Machinists has traditionally been opposed to use of job evaluation and time study.

A. Contract clauses on industrial engineering methods in the contract may provide that:

1. Time study and job evaluation manuals shall be included as supplements to the contract.

2. Joint committees of union and management shall be set up to handle the job evaluation and time study problems.

3. The company has the right to use job evaluation and time study techniques but requiring the company to consult with the union on major changes or introduction of these methods.

4. The company has the right to introduce standards whenever conditions demand.

B. Provisions for policing industrial engineering standards

Contract clauses may provide that:

1. The union has the right to file a grievance on any standard or classification at any time during the contract.

2. The union can file a grievance on any change in standards within a given period after the change has been made.

Collective Bargaining

3. The company must negotiate issues involving changes in standards.

4. The company must inform the union of any changes in standards.

5. Other sections of the contract may permit the filing of grievances on engineering standards, even if no specific clause is contained in the contract.

C. Arbitration of grievances arising from industrial engineering practices

Some contracts specify that job classifications and/or time standards are not subject to arbitration, others provide arbitration and some are silent on the question.

D. Reasons for recognizing industrial engineering practices in the contract

1. Management has the right to use these techniques. If the union fails to recognize this, it may be hampered in protection of members who may not be justly treated as a result of poor administration of the techniques.

2. If grievances concerned with job classifications, qualifications, or output go to arbitration, the union may have to present their case in light of the evidence the company presents from their industrial engineering studies.

3. Job evaluation may aid in ironing out inequities during negotiations.

E. Reasons for not accepting joint responsibility in administering industrial engineering techniques

1. Time and technical help required on the part of the union.

2. The techniques used are imperfect techniques. Not being directly involved leaves the union more free to deal with injustices which may arise under the system.

3. The union reserves its right as a policeman of the contract rather than a co-sponsor of certain provisions which vitally affect their members.

VI. Contract Provisions Safeguarding the Union

Negotiating these provisions depends on the relationship of the union and the company rather than on economic considerations. Wording these provisions to conform with the technicalities of the law is very important.

Citing prevailing practices may be helpful in bargaining. Summaries of the types of clauses in effect can be gotten from the Bureau of Labor Statistics and the Bureau of National Affairs. Model contracts which incorporate the policies of the international union or district office may be used to good effect.

A. Recognition

The recognition clause should define the unit and the jurisdiction of the unit. The description of the unit is especially important when there is no NLRB certification. Wherever the NLRB has certified the union, the description of the unit in the agreement should conform to the coverage of the Board certification.

B. Union shop provision

The union shop provision provides that after thirty days of employment all workers must become members of the union.

Maintenance of membership or modified union shop clauses also exist. They may provide that all workers who are members of the union at the time the contract is signed must remain members and that any new employees must become members after being employed for thirty days.

To be enforceable the union must have received a notice from NLRB of compliance with Sections 9 (f), (g), (h) of the Taft Hartley Law within the one year period before the signing of the union shop agreement.

Under a union shop contract the only condition under which a union can legally request the discharge of an employee is if the employee fails to pay dues or initiation fees. If the union is responsible for discharge of an employee under the union shop clause for any other reason, they are liable to suit for damages.

C. Unauthorized activity provision

Under the Taft Hartley Law--Sec. 301 (e)--the union may be held responsible for activities of its agents whether or not they were authorized to take part in or dondone particular activities. This is especially important in case of illegal strikes or secondary boycotts, in which cases the union can be sued for damages. Contract clauses specifying and limiting union responsibility in cases of unauthorized activity are an important protection.

D. Picket line clause

Sample Clause:

"The Company will not require the employees to cross any picket line established on or in front of the premises. The individual or concerted refusal to pass such picket line shall not constitute grounds for discipline, discharge or lay-off."

Comment: The use of this provision under the Taft Hartley Law is subject to interpretation. This does not guarantee that the union will be judged free from responsibility but does furnish arguments and defenses for refusal to cross picket lines.

Collective Bargaining

E. Unfair goods provisions

Sample Clause:

"The Company will not require the employees to use, process, transport or work on struck goods. The individual or concerted refusal to work on struck goods shall not constitute grounds for discipline, discharge or lay-off.

"A concerted refusal to work on struck goods shall not constitute a stoppage or strike within the meaning of this Agreement."

Comment: Sometimes this provision is called the "Hot Cargo" provision. Recently in a case involving trucking the U.S. Supreme Court held that this type of provision was valid and did not constitute an unfair labor practice on the part of the union.

VII. Provisions protecting the Contract

These provisions as in the above section are filled with legal technicalities. Success in negotiating them depends on the relationship of the union and the company. Citing prevailing practices may be helpful. Model contracts which reflect the policy of your international union or district may have a good effect.

A. Termination and reopening clauses

These clauses must be worded carefully or the union may be giving up its right to strike during negotiations. If there are flaws in the wording and the union goes on strike, they may be used for breach of contract under Title III of the Taft Hartley Act.

B. Separability and savings clauses

These clauses specify that if any provisions of the contract do not comply with the existing laws or are judged illegal that they will be renegotiated without affecting other parts of the contract.

C. Provisions in case of sale or transfer of ownership of the plant

Such clauses provide that the contract with the union shall be binding on all successors in the company. The provision may also cover future new plants in case of expansion or relocation.

VIII. Contract Provisions for Employee Security

A. Seniority provisions

Seniority provisions depend to a great extent on the operations of the particular company. Good seniority provisions have value for the company by cutting down labor turnover and decreasing frictions.

Collective Bargaining

Two general principles serve as guides for good seniority provisions:

1. Seniority should be as broad as possible -- covering as wide a section of the company's operations as practical.

2. Length of service should be the primary determiner in cases of promotion, transfer, layoff and rehiring.

   Many contracts provide that when ability to do the work is equal, length of service will be the determining factor.

   Other contracts specify that length of service will be the determining factor provided that individual with most seniority has the ability to perform the work.

   Provisions for a training period and the option of transferring back to old job after the learning period, if performance is not satisfactory, make possible the use of length of service as the sole determining factor.

   Exceptions to seniority can be written in for unusual circumstances.

B. Grievance procedures

The steps in the grievance procedure should parallel the lines of management. Number of steps will be determined by the size of the firm.

Things to keep in mind when negotiating grievance procedure:

1. Under the Taft Hartley Law the worker can present a grievance without the intervention of the steward or other union official. It is well to include a clause stating that the steward or shop committeeman shall be notified and permitted to attend at the processing of the grievance.

2. Avoid agreeing to provisions that are not covered by the grievance procedure.

3. The steward or shop committeeman should be included in processing of the grievance in the later steps when possible. This permits him to keep the members informed on progress and gives him an opportunity to learn more about his job as a steward.

C. Arbitration

Arbitration provisions usually include either a permanent arbitrator in the case of big companies or the procedures for selecting arbitrators.

Because of the wording of the contract, some grievances may be judged as not proper for arbitration; others may be specifically excluded.

D. Stewards' rights and privileges

The following provisions should be in the contract to protect the steward system:

1. Recognition of the steward as the individual accredited by the union to deal with all matters relating to grievances and interpretation of the contract.

2. Super seniority for the steward -- if a steward is laid off all the members under him could be jeopardized.

3. Steward should be paid for time lost while handling grievances. The steward by handling grievances is contributing to smooth operation of the plant.

4. The steward, with permission from his supervisor, should be free to leave his job and to go into any other part of the plant within the bargaining unit to bring about proper and expeditious disposition of a complaint or grievance.

E. Discharge and right of appeal provisions

The union should reserve the right to appeal all discharges through the grievance machinery. If the contract provides that such conduct as theft or drinking on the job are grounds for discipline, the clause should stress that the "penalty be commensurate with the 'crime'"--(although drinking on the job and theft are not condoned --taking one pencil should not carry with it a discharge penalty).

A provision should be included giving a discharged employee the right to see the steward before he leaves the plant.

Notices of discharges should be given to the steward by the company.

F. Leave of absence provisions

Such provisions protect the job and seniority of the individual who for acceptable reasons must take extended leave from his job.

G. Provisions against discrimination

Although discrimination may be illegal under existing law, these clauses permit filing of grievances where discriminatory practices exist.

INTERPRETING THE UNION CONTRACT

Introduction

Union contracts are developed during collective bargaining sessions. The clauses in a contract represent attempts to meet the problems workers face in their relationship with their employer. Many of the clauses may have been adapted from other contracts and inserted at one time or another during the time that the union and the company have been bargaining.

When reading and interpreting your contract, ask yourself these questions on each contract clause or section:

(1) What situation in the plant or what set of problems does this clause or sentence deal with?

(2) Are the conditions that led to adopting this clause still in existence?

(3) Does this clause cover all the kinds of things that could happen?

(4) Does this clause limit or restrict the union when trying to correct a just grievance of a worker?

Asking these questions and answering them will give new insights into your contract. Quite often, workers when discussing their contract will say: "We have no problems in such and such an area of labor relations." They are saying in effect, "We don't have to worry about providing for certain things in our contract until trouble arises." By careful analysis and interpretation of your contract you can avoid many problems. Management will be more likely during contract negotiations to make some changes in wording and other provisions in the contract when no dispute exists.

Also, since the development of a contract is a piecemeal process, some meaningless or conflicting statements may be inserted which can cause difficulties later.

Finally, much of labor relations in the area of the labor agreement rests on interpretation. It would be a comfortable feeling for the union to know that every minute detail is spelled out in the contract. In theory this may be fine but in practice it would prove to be a disadvantage. It is impossible to forsee every situation which may arise. A contract cannot adequately and fairly provide in specific terms for all situations. A good contract clearly covers the general areas of labor-management relations. It is recognized that in spite of being as precise as possible, situations will arise which need interpretation and many require use of the grievance procedures provided for in the contract. A negotiating committee may fail to get the best contract provisions by trying to be too specific.

Interpreting the Union Contract

In order to help in analysis of the contract in the following sections, the general areas of the contract coverage will be spelled out. These areas are:

(1) The area of maintaining the union

(2) The area of contract protection

(3) The area of protection for the individual employee

(4) The area of management rights and perogatives

(5) The basic economic area

(6) The area of paid leisure and personal time

(7) The area of social insurance and welfare

When going through your contract, it is well to write down on a piece of paper the conditions covered by your contract in each of these areas. Then make a list of items not included that you believe should be included. At this point you are ready to consider the demands for the next negotiations.

The Area of Maintaining the Union

Many of the clauses in this area are negotiated in the first contract and remain the same year after year. It is, however, in this area that changes in legislation or in NLRB interpretation may require changes in contract wording. It is wise to consult with an attorney who is competent in the field of labor law--especially, at the present time, since many changes in interpretation have been occurring. The following sections in a contract function for the preservation of the union:

a. Recognition of the Union

This clause establishes the right of the union to represent the workers...until such agreement is reached a union can represent the worker but the employer is under no obligation to listen or act.

Under recognition is usually a definition of the unit covered by the union, giving them exclusive bargaining rights. This protects the union against raids by other unions.

There should be a section giving jurisdiction over work performed. This protects the union against losing their membership if changes in operations occur. For example, skilled work may be replaced by machines that require an operator with different skills, say, a mechanic rather than a machinist.

b. Union Shop or Maintenance of Membership

This clause under the Taft-Hartley Act requires that the individual must be employed for 30 days before he can be required to join the union. Some contracts may specify longer periods than this. Maintenance of membership means that the worker who joins the union voluntarily must remain a member.

c. Check-off of Dues

This clause removes many headaches for the union and the stewards and leaves time for settling of grievances and other union business. Together with the union shop clause, it guarantees that everyone will be carrying his just part of the financial responsibility for the benefits he receives through the union.

d. Restraint Against Undermining Bargaining

Clauses stating that any changes in economic or working conditions must be bargained for through the union prohibits the employer from making changes for the benefit of the workers to demonstrate that a union is "not really necessary."

A clause prohibiting individual bargaining prevents the company from giving preferential treatment to individual workers covered by the contract and thus, help to maintain the fairness in treatment which is essential to union solidarity.

e. The Right of the Employee to Refuse to Handle Unfair Goods (Hot Cargo Clause)

At this time, the legality of such clauses in a contract is in question. Exactly, what constitutes a "secondary boycott" illegal under the Taft-Hartley law is being tested in the courts and clarified by NLRB rulings.

f. The Right of the Employees to Refuse to Cross a Picket Line

This protects the traditional solidarity within the labor movement and is of special importance in industries in which other unions have jurisdiction or if the job takes employees to other shops.

g. Non-liability for Unauthorized Activities

At times, unexpected and unauthorized strikes may occur. Under the Taft-Hartley law, the union may be held financially responsible. It is wise to state specifically that the union cannot be held liable for unauthorized activities.

h. Plant Inspection Privileges

This provision is important, since it may be crucial at times that the officials of the union come into the place of employment of members, either to get details on a grievance or to inspect safety or sanitary conditions.

i. Hiring Through the Union

Added protection is given to the members if the union has opportunity to place its unemployed members. However, there is some question under the Taft-Hartley law about what is called "preferential hiring".

The most important sections in this area of the contract are the Regognition Clause, the Union Shop, the Unauthorized Activities Clause, and Picket Line and Hot Cargo clauses.

The Area of Contract Protection

This area of the labor agreement is filled with legalities and will also reflect changes in labor legislation and NLRB decisions. A contract which cannot be enforced or can be circumvented is not effective.

The following provisions, if clearly spelled out, help to secure the contract:

a. Termination Provisions and Re-negotiation Procedures

b. Reopening Provisions

c. Retroactivity Provisions

On above provisions, be sure to learn what the present rulings are before drafting the clauses. Unless the wording is clear, you may unduly limit your right to strike during this period.

d. Successor or Sale of Physical Assets

e. Contract Invalidation by Law or Court Decision

The two provisions above, protect the total contract. In (d) if the company changed hands during this period the contract was in effect the contract would be binding on the new employer. In the case of (e) any section that is ruled as not legal by a court or is affected by changing legislation can be renegotiated without affecting the other parts of the contract.

f. Maintenance of Standards

This clause aims at protecting the existing conditions in the plant -- permitting the union to argue from past practices.

The Area of Protection for the Individual Employee

In this area are the provisions that are used in the day-to-day operation of the contract. These provisions deal with the relationships between the individual and the company and must be administered with skill and fairness. The steward is primarily concerned with these provisions.

a. Grievance and Arbitration Procedures

Without a grievance procedure a union contract would be of little value. The better the grievance procedure the more effective the contract will be, since grievances can be handled with greater speed and justice. An Arbitration Clause provides for a final disposition of grievances arising during the contract.

b. Establishment of Steward System

The grievance procedure is of very little value if there is no one to process the grievances or if company rules and regulations make it difficult for a steward to function. A clause in the contract should establish the rights of the steward and make possible his efficient functioning.

c. Seniority Provisions

These provisions are the most difficult to negotiate and of extreme importance. They depend in part on the functioning and organization of the plant and consequently require a great deal of knowledge of how the firm or industry functions. Seniority clauses spell out the individual member's rights to his job, for advancement, or transfer depending on his years of service with the company.

d. Discharge and Right of Appeal

A company may wish to keep the right of discharge unilaterally determined by company rules. Although the union will not wish to support violation of accepted rules, it will want to reserve the right to judge the rules and whether the worker is justly accused.

e. Leave of Absence Provision

Two types of considerations are involved in Leave of Absence--one is what reasons are considered legitimate and for what duration can leaves be granted and secondly, what happens to the individual's seniority rights. In recent years, military leave is prevalent. This is covered in part by law but should be recognized in the contract as well.

f. Job Description, Job Classification and Time Study Provisions

These clauses deal with the right of the union to contest and police Industrial engineering practices. They protect the workers against down-grading, unfair standards and performing work at reduced rates of pay. The actual point of view depends on the philosophy of the particular union. The policy should be carefully thought out in terms of long range effects.

g. Technological Change Provisions

Many of the effects of technological change must be provided for in other sections of the contract such as seniority and Industrial Engineering provisions. A special clause requiring a notice of plans at least, or joint negotiations on the effects of change should be stated in this clause.

h. Sanitary and Safety Provisions

Clearly stated in the contract, provisions on safety clearly define the union's role in maintaining good working conditions.

i. No Discrimination Provisions

Although many of the provisions of a labor contract are aimed at prohibiting discrimination -- a specific clause makes it easier for a union to enforce non-discrimination.

j. No Lock-out Provision

This provision prevents the company from shutting down the plant in order to bring pressure for settlement of differences between employer and union.

The Area of Management Rights and Perogatives

Generally, managements rights exist in areas not covered by the union contract. His chief concern is achieving stability of operations so that he can make a profit over a period of time. This, of course, is in part the workers concern too and so in many clauses employer rights are implied. However, in some cases the employer may wish to have certain rights specified. Some of these rights are as follows:

a. Protecting the Employer's Right to Manage and Direct the Business.

This is generally accepted as an employer's right except where specific areas are mentioned in the contract for joint determination.

b. Improving the Efficiency of the Work Force

The union should reserve the right to use the grievance machinery to appeal unjust hardship that may arise as a result of changes to improve efficiency.

c. The Right of the Employer to Hire and Fire

Here one of the basic goals of the union, job protection for the individual is involved. The union should reserve the right to sit in judgment in cases of firing or lesser discipline.

d. No-strike Provision

When an arbitration clause is in effect, generally, this is considered the final step for resolving disagreement. There may be some situations, however, where the union may wish to reserve the right to strike.

e. Union Assistance in Ending Unauthorized Strikes

If the union agrees that there shall be no strike during the life of the contract, its leaders must try to prevent or to assist in ending unauthorized work stoppage. This assumes that the company abides by the decision of an arbitrator when used.

The Basic Economic Area

This area of the contract is the most straightforward, and may include the following provisions:

Hiring in Rates of Pay
Basic Job Rates of Pay
Progression Schedules
Basic Work Day and Week
Premium Pay Provisions
Call in Pay Provisions
Guaranteed Hours (Day,Week, Year)
Cost-of-Living Provisions
Deferred Increase Schedules
Designation of Pay days.

The Area of Paid Leisure and Personal Time

This area of the contract depends on the social philosophy of the union and its members and recognizes the worker as a social being. Generally, these benefits are given instead of wage increases. They may also be viewed as rewards for longer service or improved efficiency.

Included in this area are:

Paid Vacations
Paid Holidays
In Plant Rest Periods
Funeral Leave Pay
Jury Duty
Paid Voting Time

The Area of Health and Welfare

Health and Welfare benefits are negotiated in place of cash wages. Including these benefits as part of negotiations has the advantages of providing services at reduced cost to employees. Included in this area are:

Prepaid Medical Care
Hospitilization Insurance
Sick and Accident Benefits
Life Insurance
Pension and Permanent Disability Benefits
Sick Leave
Prepaid Dental Care
Maternity Care and Benefits

If the company grants any of these benefits it is to the union's advantage to incorporate them into the contract and include them as part of bargaining since they will be considered by the company as cost items.

INTRODUCTION:

The material in this summary has been drawn largely from the bulletins[1] issued by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, (B.L.S.), Division of Wages and Industrial Relations. The information presented in these bulletins are based on questionnaires returned to the B.L.S. and estimates based on per capita payments, Bureau of Labor Management Reports forms, and financial statements of unions qualifying as national unions. A union is considered national in scope if it has collective bargaining agreements with different employers in more than one state.

The statistics and the charts contained herein should be helpful in understanding the structure, size and affiliations of American unions.

[1]White collar figures at best must be considered rough estimates because most unions do not keep separate records for white collar members as apposed to blue collar workers. This is especially true of the year 1956.

[2]1956 was the first year white collar figures were gathered.

UNION ACTIVITIES AND RELATED PROBLEMS

Listed below are some of the kinds of activities engaged in by local unions and problems often encountered with these activities. The first three: 1) Running the local, 2) Collective Bargaining, and 3) Settling Grievances, are basic functions for all unions. How many of the other activities are undertaken depends upon the size of the local, the interests of the membership, the financial resources, and the available leadership. Obviously, a local with only 50 members cannot undertake as wide a range of activities as a local of 3,000. The related problems listed are merely suggestive and are not intended to be all-inclusive.

WHAT DO YOU THINK? . . . . . .

What we think, what opinions we hold, what we believe is largely the result of what we have learned and what we have experienced. Our home, school, church, friends, and the media of communication such as newspapers, radio, and television all contribute to forming the opinions we hold.

The questions which follow deal with a variety of issues. Please do NOT sign your name, but do frankly record your opinions. The combined answers of a group help provide a picture of the range of opinions of various issues and can be of help in planning educational programs.

HELPFUL INFORMATION FOR WORKERS EMPLOYED BY PRIVATE CONTRACTORS ON GOVERNMENT JOBS

1) IN WHAT WAYS ARE LABOR STANDARDS ON GOVERNMENT CONSTRUCTION JOBS PERFORMED BY PRIVATE CONTRACTORS REGULATED BY FEDERAL LAWS?

The laws regulating labor standards on government contracts are the Prevailing Wage Law (Davis -Bacon Act, 1931), the Anti-Kickback Law (Copeland Act, 1934) the Eight Hour Law (1892 as amended) and the Contract Work Hours Act (1962).

2) IS THERE A SPECIFIED MINIMUM WAGE SET FOR CONSTRUCTION WORKERS BY THESE LAWS?

The laws require payment by contractors and sub-contractors of wage rates determined by the Secretary of Labor to be prevailing in the loaclity on construction, alteration, or repair of public buildings or public works performed under contract with the Federal government, or any construction performed for state agencies using Federal funds.

3) HOW IS THE PREVAILING WAGE RATE DETERMINED?

Before a contract is awarded the Department of Labor, at the request of the government agency for whom the work is to be done, determines the prevailing wage rate for each class of labor involved in the locality where the work is to be performed. These rates are based on information on wages paid for similar work in the locality submitted by interested parties or obtained at a hearing conducted by a Labor Department referee. Minimum wages thus determined are included in the specifications of the contract. These rates must be posted in a conspicuous spot at the site of the work and must be paid in full at least once a week, without subsequent deduction or rebate.

4) WHAT PROVISION IS MADE FOR OVERTIME WORK?

Any work performed in excess of 8 hours per day or 40 hours per week must be paid a minimum of time and one-half the basic minimum wage for the type of work performed.

5) WHAT IS THE PREVAILING WAGE RATE FOR COLOARDO?

At the present time the prevailing wage rate for all areas of Colorado is union scale.

6) IF A WORKER IS HIRED AT ONE WAGE CLASSIFICATION AND THEN IS REQUIRED TO PERFORM DUTIES IN A HIGHER CLASSIFICATION, AT WHICH RATE MUST HE BE PAID?

A worker must be paid at the specified rate for the work he is actually performing regardless of his skill in the job.

7) IF A WORKER IS PERFORMING WORK AT A LOWER CLASSIFICATION DURING PART OF THE DAY AND IS THEN CHANGED TO A HIGHER CLA SIFICATION JOB AT WHAT RATE IS HE PAID?

The worker must be paid the higher rate for the time he actually works at the higher rate job.

8) IS THE RATIO OF APPRENTICES TO JOURNEYMEN REGULATED BY FEDERAL LAW?

Apprentices are permitted to work as such only when they are individually registered under a bona fide apprenticeship program recognized with a state apprenticeship agency which is registered with the Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training, U. S. Department of Labor. The allowable ratio of apprentices to journeymen shall not be greater than the ratio permitted to the contractor under the registered program. Any employee who is not so registered shall be paid the specified wage rate for the work he actually performed. The contractor is required to furnish written proof of the registration of his program and apprentices as well as the appropriate ratios and wage rates before using any apprentices on the contract work.

9. MAY A WORKER AGREE TO WORK FOR LESS THAN THE REQUIRED RATE OR VOLUNTARILY REFUND PART OF HIS WAGES?

No, the prevailing rate must be paid. This may not be used as a defense by the contractor for paying lower wages.

10) HOW ARE UNPAID WAGES COLLECTED?

If the specified wages are not paid each week, the worker should file a complaint with the representative of the contracting agency or the Solicitor of Labor. The Solicitor for Colorado (as of May 15, 1964) is Henry Mahlman, 311 Equitable Building, Denver. His phone number is 534-4151.

If the Government agency finds the complaint valid it will call upon the Comptroller General to withhold payments from the contractor and to pay unpaid wages directly to employees out of these funds. If the amount withheld is not enough to pay all wages due the workers may sue the contractor or his bond for performance of the contract.

11) IS THERE ANY SPECIFIC FORM TO FILL OUT IN REGISTERING A COMPLAINT?

No, but be sure you have all the facts including names, dates, time, etc. Do not file complaints without supporting information.

12) WILL THE FILING OF A COMPLAINT ENDANGER MY JOB?

All complaints are kept confidential by the Department of Labor and no information is disclosed without the permission of the complainant.

13) WHAT PENALTIES MAY BE IMPOSED UPON THE CONTRACTOR FOR VIOLATING THESE PROVISIONS?

There are three possible penalties that may be imposed:

1. Withholding of payment to the contractor by the Comtroller General.
2. No award of government contracts to the violator for a period of three years.
3. Cancellation of the contract with any extra cost incurred charged to the original contractor.

THE LEVELS OF GOVERNMENT AND HOW THEY FUNCTION

I. Local Government

The County

The county is the most universal form of government in the United States. All states, with the exception of Rhode Island, have county government. In spite of this there is no common form of county government organization. The only agency that comes close to being a common central governing body is the county board.

There are two main types of county boards. One is made large by allotting one or more representatives to every town or township and to every city ward within the county. This type consists of from 40 to 85 members. The other type is a board consisting of a very few members, usually three, but sometimes five or six, elected by the county voters at large.

The presiding officer, commonly called commissioner, has no regular vote or veto, and his status as chairman is determined sometimes by the board members and sometimes by the voters. He seldom has any more power than his associates on the board.

The county board is both a policy making and an administrative agency. It normally has the responsibility for the construction and maintenance of county buildings and roads, the management of county equipment and property, and the letting of contracts in behalf of the county. It has important financial powers and duties and often has the power to set tax rates and assessments.

Other county officers who are generally elected include the sheriff, tax collector, treasurer, county attorney, and the school board. Many of these officials serve on a part time basis with the office holders carrying on a private law practice or business.

Although many authorities believe that the county will soon be replaced by other levels of government, it is becoming more and more important in serving rural constituents, developing community interests, and increasing the citizens participation in government.

The City

Unlike the structure of the county, that of the city can be placed in one of four major categories: the weak mayor plan, the commission plan, the council-manager plan, and the strong mayor plan.

The Weak Mayor Plan

The weak mayor plan is the most typical. In this model the legislative body is often called the board of aldermen or the city council. The city council is usually not very large and may range from 9 to 50 members with the average being around 20. In a weak mayor system almost all legislative and some administrative functions are lodged with the council. The council makes the budgets, enacts the ordinances, and often appoints city officials.

In addition to the councilmen there is the mayor, elected by the voters of the entire city. He is the chief executive of the city and its ceremonial head. In a weak mayor plan he has very little administrative power, and often has no veto power over city ordinances nor appointive power over city officials.

Under this system the mayor's personality and political party influence will determine whether or not he has greater administrative or legislative power than appears on paper. A mayor with a strong personality may be able to impose his policies on a weaker city council.

The increasingly complex problems of city government have often shown the weak mayor system to be inefficient and unsatisfactory. For this reason many cities have abandoned this form of government.

The Commission Plan

The commission plan was first established in 1901 after a disastrous tidal wave in Galveston, Texas demonstrated the shortcomings of the weak mayor plan.

The city commission consists of from three to seven members, usually five, who are elected at large, one of them being chairman and ceremonial mayor. The commission as a deliberative body formulates policy much in the same manner as a council, and each member is administratively responsible for the management of a specific department, such as finance, public works, public safety, etc. As long as all members are in agreement the government may run smoothly, but deadlocks can greatly disrupt leadership. Other problems with this plan include the difficulty of the voters to fix responsibility for the commission's actions and the fact that the election of a person to the commission does not necessarily qualify him to be a department head. Moreover, commissioners may tend to trade votes for the advantage of the agencies over which they preside and thereby cause budgeting difficulties and an over-all imbalance in the program. For these reasons reorganization experts have turned to the council-manager or the strong mayor plans as a more efficient way of meeting the growing demands of the modern American city.

The Council-Manager Plan

Essentially the council-manager system is this: voters elect the city council which has two main functions--first, to be a legislative body and second to pick an expert who will manage the city. This expert is a single administrative head, answerable to the city council for all policies, but with complete responsibility for the administration of the city. He alone may appoint department heads and remove them and thus has clear administrative authority and freedom of action. The manager is an expert who is supposedly free from any political connections in the city. The major advantage of this system over the weak mayor and commission plans is that, in the manager, city government has a person who plans for the city as a whole and coordinates its various functions.

The Strong Mayor Plan

In the typical strong mayor type of government, legislative authority is given to the city council elected either by wards or at large. The mayor is elected at large and has most of the power to appoint and remove department heads. He usually is given power over budget preparation and execution and has a veto over ordinances. Recently some of the larger cities have added a "chief administrative officer" who is in charge of many of the more technical aspects of administration in order to meet the criticism that few mayors can succeed both as political leader and expert administrator.

CLASSIFICATION OF COLORADO CITIES

Colorado cities operate either under a home rule charter or under charters granted by the legislature through a classification system. Three cities, which were established before Colorado became a state still operate under territorial charters.

The Home Rule System

Under Home Rule the legislature, by an act of renunciation, authorizes the cities to adopt their own charters subject only to certain general state statues. The following cities have Home Rule.

Council-Manager Form

Alamosa	Durango	Lafayette	Rifle
Boulder	Englewood	Littleton	Sterling
Canon City	Fort Collins	Longmont	Westminister
Colorado Springs	Grand Junction	Monte Vista	Wray
Cortez	Greely	Montrose
Delta	Gunnison	Pueblo

Mayor-Council Form

Craig	Denver	Fort Morgan

The Classification System

In the classification system the state legislature groups cities into classes according to their population, and provides general legislation or charter provisions for each class. In Colorado cities with 40,000 or over are called First Class Cities, Second Class Cities are between 2,500 and 40,000, Third Class Cities are those under 2,500. No Colorado cities over 40,000 have chosen to operate as First Class Cities but have instead obtained Home Rule Charters.

Statutory Second Class Cities

Aspen	Lamar	Manitou Springs	Telluride
Brush	Las Anamis	Ouray	Thornton
Commerce Town	Leadville	Rocky Ford	Victor

Territorial Charter

Colorado is the only state that still has this type of charter. Central City, Black Hawk, and Georgetown are still operating under territorial charters. At the present time these cities have a test case in the state courts that claims that under their charter the state has no power to regulate certain practices such as gambling within the city boundaries.

THE STATE LEGISLATIVE PROCESS

Getting a bill enacted into law is much more complicated than most citizens think it is. Many bills are voted down in one or both houses of the legislature and others never are reported out of committee.

How Bills Get Started

Most bills are first proposed by some state agency, by the governor or by some special interest group. Some originate with individual legislators. The idea or intent for a new law is drafted in "bill form" so that if enacted it fits the format of the already existing statutes. One or more legislators will serve as authors or sponsors of the bill and will seek its enactment. Bills may also be introduced by committees of the legislature.

The governor, in his message to the legislature, submits budget and tax proposals and other measures to the legislature for its consideration and action. A legislative council, made up of members of both houses, with a permanent staff, meets between sessions of the legislature to consider proposals and make recommendations for the next session. A deadline for the introduction of bills is usually set by legislatures.

Bills Are Assigned To Committees

Each bill introduced in the legislature is assigned to a committee which schedules hearing and discusses the merits of the bill. The bill is then referred to the entire body for action or is killed in committee. Organizations and individuals interested in a piece of legislation should be sure to have their sentiments heard by the committee, because this may help determine whether the bill is recommended for passage or "never sees the light of day". Lobbying has become an important factor in the legislative process.

Debate In The Legislature

After a bill has been favorably acted upon in committee it is put on the calendar for debate by the entire house or senate of the legislature. If it is passed there, it is sent to the other house for concurrence. If the other house insists on making amendments to the bill, it is sent back to the house where it originated and may go to a conference committee to resolve or compromise differences. This is especially true in the case of tax and public finance measures.

Action By The Governor

If both houses of the legislature vote favorably on a bill, it goes to the governor who can sign it and have it become law, or he can veto it and send it back to the legislature. If at least 2/3 of both houses favor the bill it can become law by "overriding the veto".

II. The Government of the United States

The Executive Branch

The President and the Vice President

Article II, section 1, of the Constitution provides that "the executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold this Office during the Term of four Years. . . . . together with the Vice President, chosen for the same term. . . . .".

The Founding Fathers feared a strong executive and wished to make the legislative body the actual source of power in the new government. For this reason the powers of the President were not clearly spelled out in the Constitution. The powers of the President in 1789 were few compared with those he exercises today. Under Article II, section 2, the President was made the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and could with the "Advice and Consent of the Senate," make treaties, "provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; . . . .". He was also able to appoint ambassadors, judges of the Supreme Court, and other government officials not otherwise provided for in the Constitution.

Through the efforts of such strong Presidents as Jefferson, Lincoln, Theodore Roosevelt, Wilson, and Franklin D. Roosevelt the powers of the President have increased greatly. Today in addition to being the administrative head of the executive branch the President is the chief legislator. Most of the major legislation today is proposed by the President either through his platform, his messages to Congress, or his speeches to the People.

For years the office of Vice President held no importance other than being "one heart beat away from the Presidency". The Vice President is the President of the Senate and presides over this body. He has no vote except in case of tie. Lately, however, the office has become more and more important. Today the Vice President also serves as a special agent for the President in foreign policy matters.

The Cabinet

The Cabinet is the creation of custom and tradition, going back to the first President and functioning at the pleasure of the President. The purpose of the Cabinet is to advise the president on any matter that he may wish advice.

The cabinet is composed of the heads of the ten executive departments--the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Defense, the Attorney General, the Postmaster General, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of Labor, and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare. Other officials of the executive branch are often invited by the President to participate in Cabinet meetings regularly, and others are invited from time to time for discussion of particular subjects.

The Legislative Branch

The Congress of the United States was created by Article I, section 1, of the Constitution which provided that "All legislative Powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives."

The first Congress under the Constitution met on March 4, 1789, in the Federal Hall in New York City. The Membership then consisted of 20 Senators and 59 Representatives.

The Senate is composed of 100 members, 2 from each State, who are elected to serve for 6 years. One-third of the Senate is elected every 2 years.

There are 435 seats in the House of Representatives. The number representing each State is determined by population, but each State is entitled to at lease one Representative. Members are elected for 2 year terms, all terms running for the same period.

Both the Senators and the Representatives must be residents of the State from which they are chosen. A Senator must be at least 30 years of age and a citizen of the United States for at least 9 years. A Representative must be at least 25 years of age and a citizen at least 7 years.

Article I, section 8, of the Constitution defines the powers of Congress. Included are the powers to assess and collect taxes; to regulate commerce, both interstate and foreign; to coin money; to establish post offices; to establish courts inferior to the Supreme Court; to declare war; to raise and maintain an army and navy; and to "make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers, ...".

Another power vested in the Congress is the right to propose amendments to the Constitution, whenever two-thirds of both houses shall deem it necessary. When two-thirds of the State legislatures demand changes in the Constitution, it is the duty of Congress to call a Constitutional convention. Proposed amendments shall be valid when ratified by the legislatures or conventions of two-thirds of the States.

Under the Constitution the Senate is given certain powers not accorded to the House of Representatives. The Senate approves or disapproves certain appointments by majority vote; and treaties must be concurred in by a two-thirds vote.

The House is granted the power of originating all bills for the raising of revenue.

All bills and joint resolutions must pass both the House of Representatives and the Senate and must be signed by the President to become a law. A bill may be passed over the Presidents veto by a two-thirds vote of both Houses.

When a bill or joint resolution is introduced into the House, the procedure for its enactment into law is as follows:

1. Assignment to House committee having jurisdiction.

2. If favorably considered, it is reported to the House either in its original form or with amendments.

3. If the bill is passed by the House, it is sent to the Senate and referred to the committee having jurisdiction.

4. In the Senate committee the bill, if favorably considered, may be reported out in the form received from the House or it may be amended.

5. If the bill originates in the Senate it goes first to its appropriate committee; if referred out it is then acted upon by the whole Senate; and if passed is sent to the House for action.

6. The approved bill is reported to the Senate, and if passed is returned to the House.

7. Differences in the two bodies necessitate a joint conference committee to effect a compromise.

8. When the bill is finally approved by both Houses, it is signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Vice President and is presented to the President.

9. Once the President's signature is affixed, the measure becomes a law. If the President vetoes a bill, it cannot become a law unless it is repassed by a two-thirds majority of both Houses.

The Judicial Branch

Article III, section 1, of the Constitution provides that "the judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."

The Supreme Court is made up of the Chief Justice of the United States and eight Associated Justices. Power to nominate the Justices is vested in the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. Justices are appointed for life and may not be removed for political reasons. A Justice may retire at age 70 after serving 10 years as a Federal Judge or at age 65 after serving 15 years.

Under Article III, section 2, the "judicial power shall extend to all cases, in Law or Equity, under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, ... under their authority."

The United States Courts of Appeals

The courts of appeals are intermediate courts that relieve the Supreme Court of considering all appeals in cases originally decided by the Federal trial courts.

The United States is divided into 11 judicial circuits, in each of which there is a United States court of appeals. Each court of appeals has from 3 to 9 circuit judges depending upon the amount of judicial work in the district.

District Courts of the United States

The district courts are the trial courts with general Federal jurisdiction. Each State has at least one district court with the larger States having as many as four.

Each district court has from 1 to 18 Federal judges, depending upon the amount of judicial work within its territory. Only one judge is required to hear and decide a case in district court, but some cases require 3 judges to be called together.

Cases from the district courts are reviewed by the United States Courts of Appeals except that injunction orders of special three-judge district courts, certain decisions holding acts of Congress unconstitutional, and certain criminal decisions may be appealed directly to the Supreme Court.

A LIST OF PUBLICATIONS

Attached hereto is a list of publications (by no means complete) which represents a variety of viewpoints on social, economic and political issues. The names, addresses and subscription rates are given, so that persons interested in subscribing to one or more of these publications will have the pertinent information readily available. Where the editorial policy or general point of view was easy to determine or generally known, we have used the following code for identifying publications. In other cases when the publication covered quite a range of viewpoints or when it was difficult to clarify we have merely listed the publication under one of several headings, depending upon the type of issues it deals with.

UL - Ultra Left
L - Left
LM - Liberal, Moderate or Center
C - Conservative
UR - Ultra-Right

We are aware of the fact that classifying publications is not an easy matter. We also realize that what one person considers "liberal" might be considered "ultra-right" by some other person, depending upon his own philosophy of outlook. Of course, "The final proof of the pudding is in the eating". In the final analysis everyone must judge for himself how to classify publications or the ideas they espouse.

We have prepared this list because we believe people must be informed in order to make intelligent decisions, and where possible they should have access to the points of view of a variety of organizations. We expect to add additional names of publications to this list from time to time and we will appreciate suggestions from you.

LABOR DEVELOPMENTS, International. Industrialized countries continued to increase both productivity and mechanization during 1964 while underdeveloped countries continued in their struggle to keep food and fibre production apace with population growth. Automation in many forms continued to spread in much of the industrialized world, bringing with it greater output but also posing problems of how to distribute the increased production. The United States, perhaps more than any other country, was faced with the dilemma of increasing productivity and per capita income along with persistent unemployment levels of over 5 percent and "pockets of poverty."

Significant events in labor developments, as related to trade union activities and governmental policies, are reported by continent.

International Organizations. No major changes took place in the membership of the three international labor organizations, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) (q.q.v.), and the International Federation of Catholic Trade Unions (IFCTU) (see SOCIETIES). Activities of the federations are discussed under the report on each continent. The International Labor Organization (ILO), one of the specialized agencies of the UN, continued its educational campaigns.

Africa. On the African continent, the two trends noted during 1963 continued: the demise of two competing pan-African labor groups, the militantly non-aligned All-African Trade Union Federation, and the more moderate African Trade Union Confederation; and increasing governmental control over unions. The AATUF and ATUC lost their organizational momentum as their progenitors, the Casablanca and Monrovia blocs of African countries, dissolved to facilitate "African unity" (OAU). During 1964, however, the African ICFTU affiliates, which had composed the ATUC, conducted their fourth conference of the ICFTU African Regional Organization (AFRO), with 24 countries represented at Addis Ababa, the seat of the governmental Organization of African Unity (OAU) April 8–12. This represented a significant gain for ICFTU in Africa because it received the tacit approval of the OAU.

In Tanganyika, under government initiative, the Federation of Labor, made up of 11 affiliated unions, was replaced by a single trade union to represent all workers, so that organization and finances would be centrally controlled. In Algeria, union leaders gave open support to the policies of President Ben Bella, urging workers to donate their share of profits to create new enterprises and jobs. Rather than conflicting with Ben Bella's socialist regime, labor leaders said their conflict was with Communist and left-wing intellectuals. They did run afoul the government when they opened a drive for "worker control" of French-run private companies, and the government had to curb strikes against these companies to maintain production. Trade unions in Nigeria openly defied their government by launching a 12-day general strike which forced Prime Minister Abubakar's government to negotiate higher minimum wages for all Nigerian workers, while agreeing to the creation of permanent compulsory arbitration boards for future disputes. After the strike ended, Nigerian police arrested many labor leaders on charges of conspiracy to overthrow the government, but these charges were later dropped.

Colonialism and racism remained points of labor conflict. In Southern Rhodesia, a strike called in January by African nationalists ended with two Africans killed by police. In Northern Rhodesia, strikes over alleged racial discrimination interferred with government efforts to reduce unemployment. In African eyes, and in the eyes of trade unionists the world over, South Africa's apartheid policy of racial separation caused AFRO and the ICFTU to urge trade embargoes and boycott against South Africa. The South African government passed a bill to place rigid curbs on the jobs and movements of over 7 million Africans who live in so-called white cities and on farms outside the reserves for Negroes. The bill was denounced by the parliamentary opposition and religious leaders as introducing "virtual slavery" for Africans.

Asia. The Japanese labor movement is the best organized in Asia, though divided into four rival confederations, none of which are internationally affiliated even though some of its member organizations are. SOHYO is the largest confederation with slightly over half of the organized workers adhering to it, but it suffered internal division, as shown by the fact that five of its major affiliates belong to the ICFTU and three to WFTU. The largest strike in Japanese history, to include four million workers, was called off in April after government of Prime Minister Ikeda carried out an aggressive publicity campaign, emphasizing the illegality of walkouts and threatening leaders with punishment. Several large unions withdrew from the strike after receiving generous settlements from their employers, and others backed down under various kinds of pressure, thereby shattering any hope of strike unity. SOHYO, affiliated with the Japanese Socialist Party, lost considerable backing through the failure of the strike. See JAPAN.

Asian unions are usually closely identified with political movements or parties. One exception is the non-partisan Malaysian unions. The largest trade union center in India (q.v.) is allied with the ruling Congress Party and affiliated with the ICFTU. In India the number of Emergency Production Committes, started in December 1962, had reached 1,755 by the summer of 1964. In May a general strike was called in Calcutta to protest rising prices. In Ceylon there are five central labor federations, the largest of which is the ICFTU affiliated plantation workers union. In March, the government of Ceylon proclaimed a state of emergency because of a series of strikes. Indonesian unions had a 110 percent growth. The two largest national centers, one Communist- and one Trotskyite-oriented, are affiliated with the WFTU. Unions in Burma are being reorganized into one government-directed federation. The trade union situation in Korea is very unstable. Workers staged demonstrations and strikes over rising prices and unemployment, forcing the government to end its wage ceiling for employees of state-run enterprises in January.

In the Middle East, the most stable unions are in Lebanon, where two federations are members of the ICFTU and two are members of the Confederation of Arab Trade Unions (CATU); up 78 percent in membership. In Iraq, the central federation, which was formerly a member of WFTU, is now under temporary government management after the overthrow of President Kassem last year, and in Syria unions are being reorganized by the government. The ICFTU affiliate in Iran has been dissolved, and has reformed to meet government registration requirements. Most union members in Jordan are members of CATU.

Europe. European labor became increasingly "international" during 1964 as the shortage of labor in Germany, France, Switzerland, and Sweden caused a migration of workers from Spain, Portugal, Yugoslavia, Italy, Greece, and Turkey. The European Economic Community (q.v.) policy of freeing the movement of workers between member countries has not caused new patterns of labor migration of "cheap labor" to northern countries. Instead, the 2.5 million emigrants to the northern countries have come primarily from non-member countries with lower living standards.

At mid-year Germany had 660,000 jobs open with only 112,000 jobless despite the influx of over 800,000 workers during 1963. The French government decided to seek additional 500,000 foreign workers over the next five years to ease the pressure for higher pay. French public service workers had staged a 24-hour strike in March to protest government wage restrains. In the United Kingdom, the government also sought to hold wage demands and prices down to check inflation. At least a fifth of the Swiss labor force came from other countries. The shortage of labor was a contributing factor to growing inflation in most European countries during 1964, causing governments to embark on deflationery policies which could slow economic growth and reduce the demand for labor. Inflation caused many unions to seek higher wages to keep up with price increases, but there were fewer strikes in 1964, due in part to the shortage of labor. See FRANCE.

The Franco regime in Spain (q.v.) and Franco's control of Spanish labor organizations (Sindicatos, with employers represented on an equal basis with workers) became an international issue, as the European ICFTU affiliates worked to prevent Spanish association with the Common Market. In Spain, anti-Sindicato labor groups conducted strikes and agitation for independent trade unions and in March, over 500 members of a Catholic labor group demonstrated against the sindicatos and smashed the doors of the building where the annual Congress was in session. Unemployment in Scandinavia continued at low levels, ranging from a high of several percent in mid-winter to less than 1 percent in summer. Sweden relied heavily on relocation allowances and training allowances as well as on general emergency funds for public works to maintain full employment. Denmark enacted a new supplementary pension scheme in March to supplement its national pensions, providing for full benefits after only 27 years of contributions. Yugoslavia enacted legislation permitting and encouraging workers with skills to make and sell handicraft articles and to employ as many as five workers in such private enterprises.

Latin America. The three regional labor organizations in Latin America, ORIT-ICFTU, CTAL-WFTU, and CLASC-IFCTU, have 70, 20, and 10 percent respectively affiliated with these international bodies. However, this combined number of about 7.8 million is only slightly over half of the 14.3 million Latin Americans who belong to some trade union. Organized labor makes up somewhat over 15 percent of the Latin American labor force of 90 million, but ~~and~~ is very influential because of its concentration in key industries and urban areas.

Political involvement of trade unions was particularly significant during 1964 in Argentina and Brazil (q.q.v.). President Goulart of Brazil, who was ousted by a military coup in April, had built his party with the support of the powerful trade unions. Although the military justified its take-over in terms of pre-empting a Communist plot to seize the government, rampant inflation had caused considerable dissatisfaction and made it easier for Goulart to be supplanted. Goulart had given many government workers a 100 percent increase in wages and doubled minimum pay scales for all workers. When the military moved against Goulart, the General Workers Command called a general strike to back the President, but it collapsed after one day when hundreds of labor leaders were arrested. The new President, Castelo Branco, outlawed all strikes at first, but later legitimized strikes over pay, while "purging" union leadership of "leftist" elements. Unions are not likely to play a dominant role in Brazilian politics for some time.

In Argentina, the General Labor Confederation, dominated by followers of former dictator Juan Peron, threatened a general strike in February unless the government of President Illia curbed inflation and raised minimum wages. During May and June, the CLC engaged in the tactic of having the workers "occupy" factories for carefully-planned "sit-ins." Over two million workers seized 10,000 factories during May and June, and were successful in forcing the government to meet many of their demands. Tin miners' unions in Bolivia (q.v.) were unsuccessful in gaining political power for their leader, Juan Lechin.

One constructive development in 1964 was the formation in April of the Labor Council of Central America, composed of the Labor Ministers of Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua and Costa Rica, intended to orient and coordinate labor and social policies in the five countries. EFFECTIVE PUBLIC SPEAKING

It is generally recognized that "verbal communication" or speaking is the most frequently used way of getting information or ideas to other people. Everyone who can speak does so - but many who do speak wish at times that they could express themselves more effectively.

This outline is designed for use in connection with discussions and practice sessions on "Effective Speaking". Here are some of the points to keep in mind about "public speaking".

* There is no substitute for practice in speaking.

* We learn from our mistakes as well as from the things we do correctly. Try always to get constructive criticism and suggestions for improvement wherever possible.

* Confidence in speaking grows with successful experiences. Don't try to jump hurdles so high that you fall on your face. Start with simple talks about familiar subjects (low hurdles) - subjects that are very familiar to you and that you are sure you know more about than the listeners. For example - your name, where you were born, where you went to school, the size of your family, where you work, etc.
* Each person reading these pages is a unique person with his own individual habits and abilities. Each of us will express ourselves differently. But each of us can learn to be better speakers.

* The important thing is not how much better (or poorer) a public speaker you are than other members of the class - but how much you can develop and improve your speaking ability during the period of the course and the months and years that follow.

Essential Steps in Preparing a Speech

I. Think about the audience and the occasion

A. To whom will the talk be given? What is their age, background, sex, social status, financial status? What are their needs, wants, desires and interests? What is their religion, education, politics?

B. Is the occasion a dignified one or a rough and tumble rally? What is the time and place, how comfortable will the audience be? How receptive? What will happen on the program before you speak? After you Speak?

C. What will the audience's attitude toward the speaker and the subject be? Will they be hostile, sympathetic, apathetic, well informed or uninformed?

II. Determine the general reaction you want from your audience (purpose of speech).

A. To inform: explanation, securing understanding, adding to knowledge
B. To entertain: hold interest and create enjoyment
C. To stimulate: inspire, deepen existing opinions
D. To convince: secure agreement, belief
E. To actuate: secure action based upon belief.

III. Select and narrow the subject

A. Select in relation to:
1. Interest and ability of the audience
2. Interest and ability of the speaker
3. Purpose of the occasion

B. Narrow to fit the time allowed

C. State the central idea or theme in a single sentence

IV. Collect Material. (Get more than you can use)

A. Go first to your own knowledge, experience and thinking on the subject

B. Consult printed materials - books, newspapers, magazines, government documents, etc., whatever is most useful for the chosen topic

C. Discuss your topic with another person (interview or informal talk)

V. Make a plan (Outline)

A. FIRST, plan the body (development) of the talk
1. Select the main ideas (usually two to five)
2. Arrange your main ideas according to a definite pattern
a. Time sequence
b. Topical sequence
c. Problem-solution sequence

3. Select the supporting details for each main point
a. Illustration (story)
b. Specific instances
c. Testimony
d. Statistics
e. Restatement
f. Visual aids

B. NOW plan the instruction
1. Purposes:
a. To capture the attention of the audience
b. To give the audience an overview of the speech
2. Kinds:
a. Reference to the subject or the problem
b. Reference to the occasion
c. Personal greeting (If you're a big shot away from home)
d. Question or series of questions
e. Striking or attention getting statement
f. Quotation
g. Humorous anecdote
h. Illustration
i. Summarize your procedure in dealing with the question (Tell them what you're going to tell them)
j. Use a combination of several of the above

C. FINALLY prepare the conclusion
1. Purposes:
a. To summarize the subject matter
b. To make an appeal for favorable reaction (thought or action) if you are trying to convince or actuate

V. C. (continued)

2. Kinds:
   a. Summarize the main points
   b. Restate the central idea in a single sentence
   c. Quotation
   d. Illustration
   e. Offer an inducement
   f. Present a challenge
   g. A combination of several of the above

VI. Practice aloud!

A. Study our outline until you are familiar with it; don't try to memorize.

B. Then talk using your outline or brief notes. Do not try to memorize.
   1. Go straight through your speech without stopping. You may leave out points or change them. Perhaps you ought to.
   2. Don't expect too much the first time you try; it will improve with practice.
   3. If possible, get someone to listen to you.
   4. Keep at it; oral practice is a modest investment.

C. Revise your outline and notes. You'll probably want to make some changes. You may have to lengthen or shorten the material you plan to present in the time allotted to you.

5. Hints for starting a speech

   a. A good speech must get and hold the attention of the audience.

   b. Establish rapport with the audience (get them "tuned in" on the same wave length. Refer to common interest or common acquaintance if appropriate.

   c. Do not use excuses or apologies when starting your speech. Do the best you can, but don't tell the audience that you are not competent, that you've had no time to prepare, etc. If a factual explanation is called for - say so and make it brief.

   d. Use a story when it makes a point or when it brings the audience to attention or draws it closer to you.

6. Use gestures and bodily movements that will reinforce what you are trying to convey, but none that will distract.

7. Various types of "talking":

   a. conversion
   b. introduction
   c. talk or lecture
   d. discussion
   e. debate
   f. acting
   g. report
   h. question and answer
   i. radio or TV talk
   j. readings
   k. making a motion
   l. reading minutes of meeting

8. Psychological aspects of Communication:

   a. "Taint 'knowin nothin' that does so much harm as knowin' too much that aint so".

   b. "People are usually down on things they are not up on".

   c. "People can't be expected to have any better or sounder judgment than they have information on which to base their judgment".

   d. "We are all the product of our heredity and environment- our training, experience and sense of values and goals determines what we are interested in".

   e. "We have to start where people are, not where we'd like to have them".

   f. "Pooling ignorance does not produce wisdom".

   g. "There is much to the Chinese proverb that 'a picture is worth a 1,000 words'. A good saying or quotation is often worth just as many".

      Examples:

      1. "War does not determine who is right, only who is left".
         - Benjamin Franklin
      2. "For vy do ve get so soon oldt und yet so late schmart?"
      3. "So long as there is one man willing to work but unable to find employment, the hours of labor are too long."
         - Abraham Lincoln

4. Cannibal to Missionary - "Is it true that in de White Man's Land they kills mo' people than they can eat?"

5. "On some subjects 'tis better to shut up and seem dumb than to speak and remove all doubt."

h. "A man convinced against his will is of the same opinion still".

i. "When dealing with 'emotion laden' subjects it is especially important to establish rapport".

j. "It is important to remember that 'Who is saying it and why he is saying it' will have an important bearing on how seriously the speaker is taken".

k. "One should use facts and logic in preparing a speech. Since time never permits using all available information - one must be selective. One should keep in mind that there are sins of 'omission' and of 'commission' both of which can distort the picture".

l. "There is a difference between a 'bias' and a 'prejudice'. Prejudice means to 'pre-judge without due examination' while a 'bias', is a leaning or sympathy for or against a certain point of view or issue based upon a certain amount of knowledge or experience. If one has good and defensible reasons for holding a point of view or bias there is nothing wrong with it - but to pre-judge without examination should never be indulged in".

m. "In Psychology we learn about 'conditioning' or a mental set or habit, and about the 'law of primacy of persuasion'".

n. "People do tend to respect authority - especially if it is someone whose general outlook of philosophy is similar to ones own".

o. "While there is a tendency to carry over from one issue to another and a person is likely to be 'liberal' or 'conservative' on a whole series of issues - yet one cannot and should not expect that a person who may be interested in peace will necessarily be - a vegetarian or not a church member or not a union member or not a cooperator or not a twist dancer or not an Elvis Presley fan or not a Republican, Democratic or Socialist a football fan or not a fisherman or not a chessplayer or not a smoker or not, etc., etc., etc."

p. "If a person wants to communicate he must command the attention and respect of the listeners. If not wearing a necktie causes potential listeners to turn off their 'receiver' it is wise to conform. The manner of speaking and dressing and bodily gestures all have a bearing on effective communication".

Union Administration

IMPROVING THE WORK OF COMMITTEES

WHY HAVE COMMITTEES AT ALL?

A committee enables several persons to pool their resources, experience and interests in solving a problem or doing a job where one person couldn't do it as well.

PURPOSE

The purpose of the committee should be clearly defined. Its assignment should be clear and its specific job spelled out. Is it to

- diagnose a problem?
- suggest solutions?
- reach a decision?
- find facts?
- make recommendations?
- develop a program?
- deliver a report?
- take action?

SIZE

The size of a committee should include enough members to be able to carry out the job. It should probably be no more than 12.

SELECTION

Selection should be made in person. If faced with the situation, "Nobody will volunteer" perhaps the committee is not meeting a real need. Most people will volunteer if the circumstances are right and their interests are affected.

PROBLEMS OF THE CHAIRMAN

What are the functions of a good committee chairman?

- believes in arriving at group solutions
- does all he can to bring out ideas and suggestions
- moves group forward from discussion to action
- helps group see its place in the overall union effort
- clarifies goals for the group
- makes group aware of success as it moves towards its goal

What about his relations with other members of the committee

- has confidence in other members
- wants to give members the chance to contribute
- willing to give up chairman's "prerogatives"
- feels the job is more important than his own importance

DEMOCRATIC APPROACH

Committees work best if they operate democratically with members fully participating in making and carrying out the decisions of the group.

THE AGENDA

Committee meetings should have regular agendas. The agenda should be jointly arrived at with the committee members having a full part in determining what the committee will work on and how.

COMMITTEE MEMBERS

A member on a committee has as much responsibility as the chairman for the success of the committee. Anyone who helps the group define its goals and helps move the group toward those goals is performing a leadership function.

THREE TYPES OF COMMITTEE MEMBERS

1. Self-Centered Members

   a. Blocker b. Hair splitter c. Agressor d. Playboy

   e. Recognition seeker f. Self-confessor g. Dominator

   h. Special interest pleader

2. Group-Centered Members - Concentrates on Process

   a. Clarifies issues b. Harmonizes c. Compromises

   d. Expedites e. Sets standards f. Observes

   g. Follows other suggestions

3. Task-Centered Member - Concentrates on Content

   a. Makes suggestions b. Gives opinions c. Gives facts

   d. Asks for information e. Elaborates f. Initiates ideas

   g. Orients h. Evaluates i. Summarizes

NEW LEADERS

Committees can serve as a place to develop leaders. New leaders can gain experience, develop understanding of the local, its members and problems. To have co-chairmen sometimes is a useful way to encourage the growth of a leader.

Union Administration

WHAT MAKES COMMITTEES WORK?

A. They must have a well-defined function.

B. They must have attainable goals.

C. They should have deadlines.

D. They should be required to report regularly.

E. They should consult with responsible union officers on progress.

F. They should be given recognition

By reporting at meetings

By mention in the local paper

By awards, prizes, by badges, jackets or armbands

G. They should be recruited among people who are interested in the activity.

H. Recruiting should be personal.

I. Once recruited they should be elected, or if appointed, they should be given an official credential.

J. They should have authority to do what they are supposed to do.

K. They should be allowed a budget to spend for their purposes.

L. Meetings could be held in connection with social events.

M. Rewards in connection with their activities should go to the committee members - for example, education committee members should go to Education Conference; fair practice to Fair Practice Conference.

N. At least once annually some meeting should focus on their activities.

The following is a sample news release. See if you can find any mistakes. Draw a circle around each one and note what you think is wrong in the spaces provided at the bottom of the sheet.

LOCAL 666 MEETING

By Seymour Scribe

The regular monthly meeting of Local 666 was held Thursday night in the Labor Temple. President Gavelle presided. There was a good turnout considering it was the vacation season.

Brother Art Thomas, Corresponding Secretary, reported that the International Union is revising its system of mailing lists for our International Journal, to make sure everybody receives this fine publication each month. Brother Thomas paid special tribute to the local Publicity Chairman, Brother Oscar Rathskellar, for his outstanding work in getting two items about our local printed in the last issue of the Journal.

President Gavelle reported that two out of the three grievances pending against the Ratchet Company had been dropped because they were frivolous. One is going to arbitration, involving Mike Murphy's claim he worked out of his job description. "We will show the company a thing or two on that one," President Gavelle said.

Under Good and Welfare, President Gavelle said the High School Principal had gone with him to the Board of Education on a proposal by the Executive Board to pay for two college scholarships for our young people. President Smith described the plan of the Executive Board, which is to give $500 each to the lucky ones. There will be an essay contest that will be on a subject we will pick. It will get these kids thinking along different lines than they read in the papers or might hear in their own homes. Sister Brown wanted to know why we should use our money for chil-

PURPOSES OF THE LOCAL UNION MEETING

1. To make the decisions that carry out the business of the local.

2. To inform the members about what has happened since the last meeting, what is happening at the time of the meeting, and what may be happening in the future - plus an explanation as to why these things are happening.

3. To educate the members in the principles, ideals and methods of the union and the labor movement.

4. To give the members an opportunity to speak their minds.

5. To develop a feeling of solidarity among the membership.

PROBLEMS INVOLVED IN SECURING GOOD ATTENDANCE

1. Members who feel that they must have a specific gripe before it is worth their while to attend the meeting.

2. Competition from outside interests and activities.

3. Absence of any firm pressures on members to secure their regular attendance - the feeling which some have that they do not need to attend in order to maintain their own self respect or the respect of their fellows.

4. Lack of understanding on the part of some as to the purposes of the union meeting - and of the purposes, principles, ideals and methods of the labor movement in general.

5. Inadequate publicity as to the date, time, purpose and business of the meeting - and not just the amount of publicity or the size of the notice, but the way in which the publicity is prepared.

6. The way in which some meetings are run, including:

   a. no opportunity for personal growth and development

   b. meetings which are too long, too dull or poorly organized

   c. domination of the meeting by one or two vocal members

   d. discussion of subjects which involve only a very few of those who are present

   e. discussion which is not on the subject

   f. prolonged discussion on minor points which could be referred to a committee for investigation, report, action, etc.

   g. use of parliamentary procedure in a fasion which is beyond the understanding or experience of a majority of the members, and/or the mis-use of the procedure by some members.

THE WORKER AS A CITIZEN

(Suggested outline for an 8-session short-course in Labor Education)

INTRODUCTION: This short-course is designed as a survey course that will give an overview of the legislative process in our society and of the rights and responsibilities of the worker as a citizen. Obviously 16 hours is not enough to go into great depth on any of the areas listed, but the course should provide a better understanding of the complexities of government and how it functions at the various levels.

An Overview

Why are "you" interested in this course?
What about the role of government in our society?
What about your role in government?
What proportion of our citizens vote in elections?
How many are active in the political party of their choice?
What are the requirements for voting eligibility?
What about differences in election laws from state to state?
How are political parties and political campaigns financed?

The Levels of Government and How They Function

Local Governments - city councils, county boards, townships, school districts, etc.
State Governments - legislative, administrative and judicial functions
Federal Government - legislative, administrative and judicial functions

Understanding Psychological and Economic Factors in Politics

Psychology and propaganda in politics
Economic interests and pressures
What determines the quality of government?
The role of pressure groups and special interest groups
(NAM, C. of C., AFL-CIO, AMA, NAACP, ACLU, PTA, LVW, NSRP, American Legion, V.F.W., NEA, AFT, Churches, Peace Organizations, John Birch Society, etc. Class members will be asked to volunteer to write to organizations to get their legislative programs.)

Legislative Issues of Interest to Workers

- As Workers - W.C., U.C., F.L.S.A., Safety, Social Security, etc.

- As Union Members - Wagner Act as amended by Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin Acts, Right-to-work laws, etc.

- As Consumers - Protective legislation for health, safety, honest advertising, packaging, labeling, etc.

- As Citizens - Taxation and public finance, governmental services, who pays for them and how, education, health, safety, civil rights, full employment, world affairs, etc.

Participating in the Legislative and Political Process

- As Workers and Citizens - Being registered, voting, getting others interested in issues

- As Union Members - Developing legislative programs, working with COPE, MNPL, etc.

OPINION QUESTIONNAIRE

(Do not sign your name)

Listed below are a number of items taken from University of Minnesota Industrial Relations Center union research questionnaires. The items selected are about unions in general and can be answered by persons who are not members of any union.

Key: SA-Strongly Agree, A-Agree, Un-Undecided, D-Disagree, SD-Strongly Disagree

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

We wheedled and threatened and blustered,
We ranted and wrangled and roared,
We chided and fretted; we scoffed and we petted,
We snickered and wept and implored;
We groveled and swore and demanded,
We spurned and we fawned and we brayed,
We trampled on data, we tossed ultimata,
We grumped and stamped and inveighed;
We whimpered and simpered and shouted,
Pretended, defended and doubted;
We smiled and we jested,
Reviled and protested,
Debated, orated and scouted!

We cooed, pooh-poohed, we yelled, rebelled,
We warned, we scorned, we yammered;
We slurred, we purred, we sighed, defied,
We wailed, and railed, and clamored.

We fumed and we sneered and we whined,
We flattered, cajoled and maligned,
Consented, revoked and declined. . .
And finally the contract was signed!

FENCE OR AMBULANCE
(By Joseph Malins in "Hearing News")

'Twas a dangerous cliff, as they freely confessed,
Though to walk near its crest was so pleasant,
But over its terrible edge there had slipped
A duke and full many a peasant;
So the people said something would have to be done
But their projects did not at all tally;
Some said: "Put a fence 'round the edge of the cliff."
Some: "An ambulance down in the valley."

But the cry for the ambulance carried the day
For it spread through the neighboring city;
A fence may be useful or not, it is true,
But each heart became brimful of pity
For those who slipped over the dangerous cliff,
And the dwellers in highway and alley
Gave pounds or gave pence, not to put up a fence
But an ambulance down in the valley.

"For the cliff is all right, if you're careful", they said.
"And if folks even slip and are dropping,
It isn't the slipping that hurts them so much,
As the shock down below when they're stopping."
So day after day as those mishaps occurred
Quick forth would these rescuers sally
To pick up the victims who fell off the cliff,
With the ambulance down in the valley.

Then an old sage remarked: "It's a marvel to me
The people give far more attention
To repairing results than to stopping the cause
When they'd much better aim at prevention.
"Let us stop at its source all this mischief", cried he "Come, neighbors and friends, let us rally;
If the cliff we will fence we might almost dispense
With the ambulance down in the valley."

"Oh, he's a fanatic," the others rejoined "Dispense with the ambulance? Never!"
"He'd dispense with all charities, too, if he could;
No! No! We'll support them forever.
Aren't we picking up folks just as fast as they fall
And shall this man dictate to us? Shall he?
Why should people of sense stop to put up a fence
While their ambulance works in the valley?

But a sensible few, who are practical too,
Will not bear this nonsense much longer,
They believe that prevention is better than cure
And their party will soon be the stronger.
Encourage them then with your purse, voice and pen
And while other philanthropists dally
They will scorn all defense and put a stout fence
On the cliff that hangs over the valley.

Better guide well the young than reclaim them when old,
For the voice of true wisdom is calling;
To rescue the fall is good, but 'tis best
To prevent other people from falling.
Better close up the source of temptation and crime
Than deliver from dungeon or galley,
Better put a strong fence round the top of the cliff
Than an ambulance down in the valley.

MOURN NOT THE DEAD!
By Ralph Chaplin

Mourn not the dead that in the cool earth lie,
Dust unto dust
The calm sweet earth that mothers all who die
As all men must.

Mourn not your captive comrades who must swell
Too strong to strive
Each in his steel-bound coffin of a cell
Buried alive.

But rather mourn the apathetic throng
The cowed and the meek
Who see the world's great anguish and its wrong
And dare not speak....

- - - - -

The following statement was made by Donald Richberg in December 1934 at Cleveland, Ohio, when talking about the unemployed to a group of social workers....."It is cheaper even from a money standpoint, to provide work for the idle hands, than it is to pay for the armies necessary to hold back these people when once their pleading fingers turn into threatening claws."

THE LIFE OF A

UNION REPRESENTATIVE

If he talks on a subject, he is trying to run things.

If he is silent, he has lost interest in the organization.

If he is seen at the office, why doesn't he get out.

If he can't be found, why doesn't he come around more often.

If he is not at home at night, he must be out drinking.

If he is at home, he is ducking.

If he does not agree that the boss is a skunk, he is a company man.

If he calls the boss a skunk, he is ignorant.

If he doesn't beat his chest and yell STRIKE, he is a conservative.

If he does, he is a radical.

If he doesn't stop to talk, his job has gone to his head.

If he does, that's all he has to do anyway.

If he gives someone a short answer, we'll get him in the next election.

If he tries to explain something, he's playing politics.

If he works out a good agreement with the boss, why didn't he ask for more.

If his clothes are clean, he's a big shot.

If he takes a vacation, he's had one all year.

If he's on the job a short time, he is inexperienced.

If he has been on a long time, there should be a change.

The One Hundred Percent American

Condensed from The American Mercury

Ralph Linton
Anthropologist, University of Wisconsin; author of "The Study of Man, an Introduction"

Despite the average American's pride in things American, some insidious foreign ideas have already wormed their way into his civilization.

Thus dawn finds the unsuspecting patriot garbed in pajamas, a garment of East Indian origin, and lying in a bed built on a pattern which originated in either Persia or Asia Minor. On waking he glances at the clock, a medieval European invention, uses one potent Latin word in abbreviated form, rises in haste, and goes to the bathroom.

Here he must feel himself in the presence of a great American institution--until he remembers that glass was invented by the ancient Egyptians, the use of glazed tiles for floors and walls in the Near East, and porcelain in China. Even his bathtub and toilet are copies of Roman originals. The only purely American contribution is the steam radiator, against which our patriot very briefly and unintentionally places his posterior. In the bathroom the American shaves (a rite developed by the priests of ancient Egypt), washes with soap invented by the ancient Gauls, and dries himself on a Turkish towel.

Returning to the bedroom, the unconscious victim of un-American practices puts on garments whose form derives from the skin clothing of ancient nomads of the Asiatic steppes, and fastens them with buttons whose prototypes appeared in Europe at the close of the Stone Age. This costume, appropriate enough for outdoor exercise in a cold climate, is quite unsuited to American summers, steam-heated houses, and Pullmans. Nevertheless, foreign ideas and habits hold the unfortunate man in thrall. He puts on his feet stiff coverings made from hide prepared by a process invented in ancient Egypt. Lastly, he ties about his neck a strip of bright-colored cloth which is a vestigial survival of the shoulder shawls worn by 17th century Croats. Then he gives himself a final appraisal in the mirror, an old Mediterranean invention, and goes downstairs to breakfast.

Here his food and drink are placed before him in pottery vessels, the popular name for which--china--betrays their origin. His fork is a medieval Italian invention and his spoon a copy of a Roman original.

If our patriot adheres to the so-called American breakfast, his coffee (descendant of an Abyssinian plant) will be accompanied by an orange, domesticated in the Mediterranian region. He will follow this with a bowl of cereal made from grain domesticated in the Near East. Then he will go on to waffles, a Scandinavian invention, with plenty of butter, originally a Near-Eastern cosmetic.

Breakfast over, he places on his head a molded piece of felt, invented by the nomads of Eastern Asia, and sprints for his train--the train, not the sprinting, being an English invention. If it looks like rain, he takes an umbrella, invented in India. At the station he pays for his newspaper with coins invented in ancient Lydia. Once on board the train he settles back to inhale the fumes of a cigarette invented in Mexico, or a cigar invented in Brazil.

Meanwhile our American reads the news of the day, imprinted in characters invented by the ancient Semites by a process invented in Germany upon a material invented in China. As he scans the latest editorial pointing out the dire results to our institutions of accepting foreign ideas, he will not fail to thank a Hebrew God in an Indo-European language that he is a one hundred percent (decimal system invented by the Greeks) American (from Americus Vespucci, Italian geographer).

WHICH ARE YOU???

Are you an active member, the kind that would be missed,
Or are you just contented, that your name is on the list?
Do you attend the meetings, and mingle with the flock?
Or do you stay at home and criticize and knock?
Do you take an active part to help the work along.
Or are you satisfied to be the kind that "just belong"?
Do you ever go to visit a member who is sick?
Or leave the work to just a few and talk about "the clique"?
There's quite a program scheduled that I'm sure you've heard about
And we'll appreciate if you too, will come and help us out.
So come to the meetings often and help with hand and heart,
Don't just be a member, but take an active part.
Think this over member, you know right from wrong,
Are you an active member, or do you just belong?

ARE YOU POSITIVE?

MR. DOOLEY ON THE OPEN SHOP
By. F. P. Dunne

"'What's all this that's in the papers about the open shop?' asked Mr. Hennessey.

"'Why, don't ye know?' said Mr. Dooley. 'Really, I'm surprized at yer ignorance, Hinnissey. What is th' open shop? Sure, 'tis where they kape the doors open to accommodate th' constant stream av' min comin' in t' take jobs cheaper than th' min what has th' jobs. 'Tis like this, Hinnissey: Suppose wan av these freeborn citizens is workin' in an open shop f'r th' princely wage av wan large iron dollar a day av tin hour. Along comes anither son-av-gun and he sez t' th' boss, "Oi think Oi could handle th' job nicely f'r ninety cints." "Sure," sez th' boss, and th' wan dollar man gets out into th' crool woruld t' exercise hiz inalienable roights as a freeborn American citizen an' scab on some other poor devil. An' so it goes on, Hinnissey. An' who gets th' benefit? Thrue, it saves th' boss money, but he don't care no more f'r money thin he does his right eye.

"'It's all principle wid him. He hates t' see men robbed av their indipindence. They must have their indipindence, regardless av anything else.'

"'But,' said Mr. Hennessey, 'these open-shop min ye menshun say they are f'r unions if properly conducted.'

"'Shure,' said Mr. Dooley, 'if properly conducted. An' there we are: an' how would they have them conducted? No strikes, no rules, no contracts, no scales, hardly iny wages, an' dam few mimbers.'"

"THE ANIMAL SCHOOL"

(A fable of the administration of the school curriculum with special reference to individual differences.)

by Dr. G. H. Reavis
Assistant Superintendent
Cincinnati Public Schools

Once upon a time the animals decided they must do something heroic to meet the problems of a "new world", so they organized a school. They adopted an activity curriculum consisting of running, climbing, swimming, and flying; and to make it easier to administer, all the animals took all the subjects.

The duck was excellent in swimming, better in fact than his instructor, and made passing grades in flying, but he was very poor in running. Since he was slow in running, he had to stay after school and also drop swimming to practice running. This was kept up until his web feet were badly worn and he was only average in swimming. But average was acceptable in school so nobody worried about that except the duck.

The rabbit started at the top of the class in running, but had a nervous breakdown because of so much make-up work in swimming.

The squirrel was excellent in climbing until he developed frustration in the flying class where his teacher made him start from the ground up instead of from the tree-top down. He also developed 'charlie horses' from over-exertion and got C in climbing and D in running.

The eagle was a problem child and was disciplined severely. In the climbing class he beat all the others to the top of the tree but insisted on using his own way to get there.

At the end of the year, an abnormal eel that could swim exceedingly well and also run, climb and fly a little had the highest average and was valedictorian.

The prairie dogs stayed out of school and fought the tax levy because the administration would not add digging and burrowing to the curriculum. They apprenticed their child to a badger and later joined the groundhogs and gophers to start a successful private school.

Does this fable have a moral?

Labor Education – Unions

Federation Pres. George Meany discusses the current state of affairs in the labor movement.

Labor Studies Center Operations Stress the Practical Approach

There are no ivy-covered walls at 1500 Massachusetts Avenue where the new AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center is located in Washington.

The curriculum of the training programs parallels the appearance of the facilities: practical and functional—designed for the immediate needs of the people in the labor movement.

Yet the expertise of the teaching staff in labor affairs and the availability of key officials in government and the trade union movement puts the center well beyond the scope of long established labor institutes at colleges and universities.

Twenty students in the initial staff development program represented a wide cross section of AFL-CIO affiliates in industrial and white collar unions and the building trades.

The teaching and administrative staff of the center is headed by Dir. Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., former professor and associate director of the School of Labor & Industrial Relations at Michigan State University.

Hoehler cited the particular advantage of locating the center in Washington because of the availability of experts in labor and government to supplement the regular teaching staff.

"Universities find it impossible to mass such a wealth of teaching talent readily available to come in as visiting lecturers," he observed.

The pool of "talent" includes congressmen and senators, officials of key government agencies and the Administration, department heads of the fed-

Labor Studies Center Operations Stress the Practical Approach

There are no ivy-covered walls at 1500 Massachusetts Avenue where the new AFL-CIO Labor Studies Center is located in Washington.

The curriculum of the training programs parallels the appearance of the facilities: practical and functional—designed for the immediate needs of the people in the labor movement.

Yet the expertise of the teaching staff in labor affairs and the availability of key officials in government and the trade union movement puts the center well beyond the scope of long established labor institutes at colleges and universities.

Twenty students in the initial staff development program represented a wide cross section of AFL-CIO affiliates in industrial and white collar unions and the building trades.

The school day begins at 9 a.m. for a full schedule of classes running through 4:30 p.m. with a break for lunch at mid-day. Two nights a week the students return to the center for labor policy seminars.

Five of the three-week staff development programs will be offered during the first six months of operation. Simultaneously, one week institutes are being conducted, to cover special studies in civil rights, social security, labor education, urban affairs, state and local bodies, international affairs, organizing and political and legislative activities.

Packed into the staff development training is a curriculum calling for 15 hours of study in each of these areas: economics, social studies and effective reading.

An additional 18-20 hours are devoted to union history and current labor affairs. The participants also spend another 18-20 hours in special study projects.

A counseling service is provided to the students to prepare them for their research into the special projects. On completing their studies, they make a report on the subject to the class.

The teaching and administrative staff of the center is headed by Dir. Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., former professor and associate director of the School of Labor & Industrial Relations at Michigan State University.

Hoehler cited the particular advantage of locating the center in Washington because of the availability of experts in labor and government to supplement the regular teaching staff.

"Universities find it impossible to mass such a wealth of teaching talent readily available to come in as visiting lecturers," he observed.

The pool of "talent" includes congressmen and senators, officials of key government agencies and the Administration, department heads of the federation and officers of a number of unions based in Washington.

Among the first special lecturers was Federation Pres. George Meany, who discussed a wide range of topics affecting labor and internal affairs of the trade union movement.

Hoehler said that programs being developed at the center will not only supplement the labor studies now existing at colleges and universities, but should aid in improving the current programs on the nation's campuses.

Long range proposals for the center are still fluid. But consideration is being given toward developing programs running for three to six months and later with 12-month terms.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Lane Kirkland told graduates of the first staff development program that the basic factor in the success of any new federation project such as the school is support from the international unions.

More than a school, the center is a "trade union environment," Kirkland said, in which people from different unions can work together, exchange new ideas and share experiences.

2,300-Worker Celco Plant Picks TWUA

Narrows, Va.—Bargaining rights for more than 2,300 workers at the Celco plant of the Celanese Corp. here were won by the Textile Workers Union of America in a recent National Labor Relations Board election.

The vote for the TWUA came as the contract between the Celco plant management and the International Union of District 50 ended. District 50 had had a contract with the synthetic fibers plant for 25 years.

Final results in the NLRB election, conducted over a three day period, were: TWUA 996; District 50, 919; Chemical Workers, 66; no union, 6. There was one challenged ballot and two were void.

TWUA Pres. William Pollock and Organizing Dir. Paul Swaity who headed the campaign, said the victory was greatly aided by the help of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization and other AFL-CIO unions.

A Rubber Workers local in Hopewell, Va., which switched from District 50 to the AFL-CIO last March, addressed a letter to each of the Celanese workers informing them that the change had made the Hopewell workers "happier and richer."

TWUA represents the three other acetate fibers plants of the Celanese Corp. located in Rome, Ga., Rock Hill, S.C., and Cumberland, Md. It also represents a number of other plants of the Celanese Corp. engaged in the manufacture of other products.

The Celco plant was the last remaining synthetic fiber plant represented by District 50.

Pollock said the TWUA would

APPRENTICESHIP OUTREACH program for Memphis, Tenn., will be established by the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute in cooperation with the local building trades council. It will be financed by a Labor Dept. grant. Signing the agreement are U.S. Manpower Administrator Malcolm R. Lovell, Jr., left, and HRDI Pres. Julius F. Rothman. Standing are HRDI Executive Dir. Merlin L. Taylor and Robert Brown, associate manpower administrator.

Union Trainees Attend Poverty Conference

Oklahoma City—Training to develope more effective programs to combat poverty was keyed to be needs of 52 trade unionists at a labor-government conference here conducted by the University of Houston.

The trainees at the week-long conference represented 37 AFL-CIO state and local central bodies from eight southern, and Rocky Mountain states. Their course of instruction centered on federal anti-poverty programs and how union members can work with community action agencies.

The trainees came from Oklahoma, Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi, New Mexico, Arizona, Colorado and Wyoming. They will work in training sessions to be conducted during 1970 by the University of Houston Center for Human Resources. Last year, the program trained 109 unionists.

In their home areas of operation, the trainees will work with fellow unionists in developing new community action activities to aid the poor or expand existing programs.

Hope to Keep Joblessness Down:

'70 Outlook Pitched To Low Growth Rate

The report noted that Administration programs in manpower training and welfare reform "will also help cushion the impact of a temporary increase in unemployment."

Looking beyond 1970, the CEA projected GNP growth through 1975 and various forms of expenditures. It concluded that the projected claims, which assume "no addition to present federal non-defense programs beyond those already proposed by the Administration, would approximately absorb all available resources through 1973 and leave room for significant additions only by 1975."

The Administration budget proposals show mild increases in spending for crime and law enforcement, water pollution and a few other scattered programs in a very tight budget geared to a goal of curbing inflation.

The CEA's projections show a growth from an actual 1969 GNP of $932 billion to a 1975 GNP of $1,200 billion—an increase of $268 billion. The total increase of federal and state and local government purchases (read government programs) for the five-year period would be $13 billion, with federal funds dropping and state and local expenditures rising as part of the Administration's "new federalism."

In contrast, gross private investment, including construction, would increase $50 billion and personal of inflation. Businesses find themselves selling in markets less receptive to price increases. This forces greater resistance to cost increases, including wage increases. These pressures against inflation will continue if demand remains below potential output, even though demand begins to rise more rapidly."

The President and his council conceded that their policy "courts the risk of some rise in unemployment," but Mr. Nixon said that his policies hold out the only hope of keeping "that risk low."

Expansion of the economy in the second half of the year, implying loosening of economic restraints, is geared to containing that "risk," the council said.

Business investment is expected to show a "strong further gain" of about 8 percent for 1970, housing starts will remain at their present critical low and government expenditures, including state and local, will remain about the same at least for the first half of the year.

Appeals Court Backs Women On Equal Pay

Philadelphia — The 3rd Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals has issued a decision which could have far-reaching effects on equal pay for women. The unanimous decision reversed a lower federal court's ruling in a case involving women employes of the Wheaton Glass

Corp. located in Rome, Ga., Rock Hill, S.C., and Cumberland, Md. It also represents a number of other plants of the Celanese Corp. engaged in the manufacture of other products.

The Celco plant was the last remaining synthetic fiber plant represented by District 50.

Pollock said the TWUA would move immediately to negotiate a new contract in the Celco plant to bring wages and conditions up to the level of the three other acetate fibers plants of the Celanese Corp. represented by TWUA. The contract is up for renewal this month.

Plumbers' Label to Go On Prefabricated Units

In-plant production and assembly of plumbing system components by union craftsmen got the go-ahead with the signing of a national agreement by the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters and American-Standard, Inc.

This is the first time the union has approved a plan for production of prefabricated plumbing system components by its members.

The production will involve piping, fixtures and fittings for use in bathroom and kitchen components to be installed in houses.

The agreement, signed in the office of Housing & Urban Development Sec. George Romney, was hailed as a move to increase the volume of available housing.

Prior to the agreement, the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters encouraged the fabrication of plumbing systems on the job sites rather than in the factory.

Under the agreement, factory assembled plumbing units will bear the union's label signifying that they were assembled by skilled union craftsmen. The systems then may be shipped to all other union local jurisdictions for installation.

Provisions of the agreement call for use of so-called "industrialized" plumbers, a classification in addition to the traditional journeymen.

Wage rates and fringe benefits for the production plumbers will be negotiated locally and are to be based on the economic conditions existing in surrounding areas, the union said.

Pres. Peter T. Schoemann of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters said the new agreement represents an innovation "designed to solve one of the greatest challenges of our times —more jobs for more people."

Schoemann noted that in recent months the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters have adopted other innovative steps toward expanding job opportunities and meeting the nation's housing crisis.

He referred to the training program for minority group members for the pipefitting trades and the agreement with a building firm for factory prefabrication of modular homes.

Teachers to Study L.A. Pilot Merger

The American Federation of Teachers will not participate in any more mergers on the city level for the time being, AFT Pres. David Selden said in releasing terms of a merger agreement between AFT Local 1021 and the Association of Classroom Teachers, Los Angeles.

"We view the Los Angeles merger as an experiment in teacher unity," Selden said. "We do not intend to participate in any more pilot projects on a city level until after we have seen the effects of the Los Angeles endeavor." It took effect Feb. 1.

from eight southern, and Rocky Mountain states. Their course of instruction centered on federal anti-poverty programs and how union members can work with community action agencies.

The trainees came from Oklahoma, Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi, New Mexico, Arizona, Colorado and Wyoming. They will work in their home states to expand opportunities for disadvantaged citizens.

The union leaderships training program is funded by the Office of Economic Opportunity and labor organizations from the eight states.

This was the first of three during 1970 by the University of Houston Center for Human Resources. Last year, the program trained 109 unionists.

In their home areas of operation, the trainees will work with fellow unionists in developing new community action activities to aid the poor or expand existing programs. OEO-labor representatives will be sent throughout the eight-state region to assist the trainees over the next several months.

Most of the trainees will return to a follow-up conference in about three months.

Key participants in the Oklahoma City training conference were Julius Rothman, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Urban Affairs, and George Guernsey, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

A number of other manpower and labor specialists took part in the daily workshops at the conference. Dr. J. Earl Williams is project administrator for the joint OEO-Union Leadership Program which parallels similar efforts in Appalachia and in New England.

A one-day conference also was held recently in Joplin, Mo., for union representatives sponsored by the Southwest Missouri Labor Council and the OEO. It covered a number of government poverty programs including housing, community agencies, manpower, VISTA and legal services.

Cave Guides Pick Service Employes

Guides at Mammoth Cave, Ky., have chosen Service Employes Local 557, Louisville, Ky., as their exclusive collective bargaining representative.

The new unit, said by SEIU to be the first of its kind in the national parks, includes 44 guides who conduct several hundred thousand tourists through 150 miles of winding trails in southern Kentucky.

The union won recognition from the regional National Park Service under Executive Order 10988, setting the terms under which a union may be chosen as exclusive representative. The guides have named committees to prepare proposals for a first agreement.

ment purchases (read government programs) for the five-year period would be $13 billion, with federal funds dropping and state and local expenditures rising as part of the Administration's "new federalism."

In contrast, gross private investment, including construction, would increase $50 billion and personal consumption expenditures by $193 billion.

The President, in his message to Congress, called 1969 a year of progress in the fight against inflation as the rate of price increases began to level out. He said the outlook for a slowdown in the rate of consumer prices "is a reasonable expectation" in 1970.

McCracken told a press briefing that he was looking for a 3.5 percent rate of inflation in the final three months of 1970 compared to a rate of 4.7 percent for the same period in 1969.

The Administration's economic policy of combatting inflation by slowing economic growth was spelled out by the CEA when it said that by mid-1970 "the economy, after three quarters of very little increase of real output, would be producing significantly below its potential. Such a GNP gap places a downward pressure on the rate

On Equal Pay

Philadelphia — The 3rd Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals has issued a decision which could have far-reaching effects on equal pay for women. The unanimous decision reversed a lower federal court's ruling in a case involving women employes of the Wheaton Glass Company's plant at Millville, N.J.

The case could involve as much as $250,000 in back pay for the women involved. The Secretary of Labor took the case to court as a violation of the Equal Pay Act of 1963, which prohibits separate pay scales for women.

The lower court ruled that the Labor Dept. had not proved that the 21.5 cents less per hour paid to selector-packers was based solely on discrimination by sex. But the higher court reversed the ruling, stating that the employer may not escape the provisions of the Equal Pay Act by making artificial job classifications.

The decision pointed out that the provisions of the Act do not require that jobs be identical, but only that they be substantially equal in order for women to receive the same pay.

Russian Unions 'Police,' But Not for Grievances

New York—Russia's so-called labor organization has called for a national crackdown on workers who are guilty of "absenteeism, loafing and drunkenness," according to the New York Times.

Its correspondent, Bernard Gwertzman, reported on a resolution adopted by the All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions which urged action "by all means possible" against "violations of work and production discipline."

Punishment would range from reprimands by friends and "condemnation" at workers' meetings to trials by "comradely courts," which could strip offenders of vacations, sick pay and other benefits.

Gwertzman pointed out that unions in Russia are an arm of the Communist party and, in effect, pass on to workers the decisions of the government. The union's obligation to protect workers against unjust employer decisions poses some difficulty, he noted, since managements also are under party control.

LABOR EDUCATION PROGRAM OFF TO A GOOD START

. . . . . NOTICE . . . . .

CLEAR sponsors Special Symposium on Employment with Colorado Labor Council

A special symposium on the "Economic, Political and Psychological Aspects of Employment" is scheduled at the Hotel Albany, 1411-17th St., Denver, on May 22-23. Sponsored in cooperation with the Colorado Labor Council, the program will bring together experts from labor, government and the academic community to discuss one of the most basic problems facing America.

Out of state speakers will include: Nat Goldfinger, Washington, D.C., Director of Research, AFL-CIO; Prof. Joel Seidman, University of Chicago and a representative of the President's Council of Economic Advisors. University of Colorado faculty members on the program include: Professors Leslie Fishman, Michael Kalk, Dorothy Martin, and George Zinke. Others are: Prof. Donald Seastone, CSU, and Prof. John S. Gilmore, of Denver University (invited), and William Bailey, Director of the Denver office of Manpower, Automation and Training.

Sessions will begin at 7:15 P.M. on Friday the 22nd and continue through Saturday afternoon. The registration fee is $6 per person, including Saturday luncheon. Checks should be made payable to the University of Colorado and mailed to CLEAR, 102 Woodbury Hall, Boulder.

Unions are invited to consider sending representatives,- at their next meeting. Please use the application blank on the back page.

Over 300 Enrolled in Short-Courses by Feb. 1

Labor Education short-courses have been held or are scheduled in seven of the State's eight Central Labor Bodies since Professor Walter H. Uphoff, formerly Director of Labor Education at the University of Minnesota, joined the CU faculty last July.

Courses given to date include "Leadership Training", "Union Administration", "The Worker as a Citizen", and "Steward Training". A course on "Effective Speaking on Current Labor Issues" is scheduled to begin at Fort Collins in March.

The largest class to date was held at Grand Junction for the Trades & Labor Assembly January 30th to February 1st, where 64 persons from 12 locals participated.

Other courses offered by CLEAR this fall and winter include:

LaJunta (Otero County Central Labor Council): Three week-end courses in October, November and December - 25 enrolled from 7 locals.

Denver Area Labor Federation: An 8-week course on "The Worker as a Citizen" - with 33 enrolled from 16 locals. Another course with 31 enrolled began February 5th.

Northern Colorado Labor Council: Four sessions at Fort Collins and 4 at Greeley with 37 enrolled from 8 locals.

Colorado Springs Area Labor Council: Two all-day Saturday sessions held to date and another scheduled for March 14th.

Colorado Union of Public Employees (CUPE) at Pueblo had 24 persons from public employee locals in that area take part in an introductory course on "Grievance Procedure for Public Employees" on December 5th.

COURSE ON "COLLECTIVE BARGAINING" TO BE GIVEN AT DENVER CENTER THIS FALL

Economics 462, "The Economics of Collective Bargaining" will be given at the Denver Center on Friday evenings from 5:35 to 7:55 starting September 24 and continuing until January 28. The course will be taught by Professor Bob Repas of Michigan State University who will be on the CLEAR staff part-time for 1965-66. This is one of the courses which Professor G. W. Zinke teaches at Boulder and which he has also taught at the Denver Center.

While pre-requisites and permission of instructor are required for college credit, adults who may not have all the required background can also take the course, but without receiving credit. The fee is $39. Persons interested in registering for the course are urged to contact the Denver Center, 1100 14th St. for a bulletin. Phone 244-6081. Registration dates are Sept. 14 for graduate students from 4:00 to 7:30 P.M. Undergraduate students M through Z, 10:00 A.M. to 1:00 P.M. and 4:00 to 7:30 P.M. on Sept. 15. Undergraduates A through L will be registered at the above hours on Sept. 16. There will be an additional fee for late registrants

Professor Bob Repas of Michigan State University Joins CLEAR Staff for 1965-66

Bob Repas, Associate Professor of Labor and Industrial Relations at Michigan State University will be on sabbatical leave from that institution and has agreed to assist CLEAR with its labor education programs on a half-time basis this year. His other time will be spent doing research on collective bargaining among public employees.

Bob has had extensive experience in labor education and will be a welcome addition to the staff. He worked with AFSC&ME Chemical Workers and the ACW. He also taught at the University of Wisconsin School for Workers and was Labor-International Affairs Rep. for the American Friends Service Committee before joining the faculty at Michigan State. In 1949-50 he had a labor fellowship at Ruskin College in England.

"Role of Labor" Course at Denver Center - Second Semester.

Social Science #312, a 3-credit course on "The Role of Labor in the 20th Century" has been given twice on the Boulder Campus and was given at the Denver Center during the spring semester. Twelve union members and eleven students with no union affiliation took the course. Unions represented included: AFT, Bricklayers, Fire Fighters, ITU, Teamsters, Machinists, Pressmen, Lathers, Brewery, Lithographers, Plumbers and Rubber Workers. Five students, who were eligible, took the course for graduate credit by doing heavier assignments.

Unions and union members interested in this course are invited to contact CLEAR or the Denver Center for details before the second semester begins. The course will again be taught by W. H. Uphoff, Professor of Economics & Director of Labor Education.

TRADE UNION CLASSES Winter 1966

for union members and officers in the Milwaukee area

The School for Workers, University of Wisconsin Extension Division; The Milwaukee Vocational, Technical and Adult Schools; and the Milwaukee area labor movement join in sponsoring two winter classes for Milwaukee area union members and officers. Classes are open to all men and women interested in studying problems of the trade union movement.

Classes meet at the Milwaukee Vocational, Technical and Adult Schools, 1015 North 6th Street. Each class meets once a week for nine weeks from 7:20 p.m. to 9:20 p.m., starting the first week in January. Starting dates and room numbers are noted below.

CLASSES

LABOR RELATIONS AND THE LAW

—starts Monday, Jan. 3, 1966 in room C 202

The provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act as they relate to union organization, contract negotiations and union administration. . . . Recent Labor Board and Court decisions affecting labor relations. . . . Current proposals for amending Taft-Hartley. . . . The provisions and applications of the Wisconsin Peace Act. This class will provide a good background in federal and state labor law for union members, stewards and officers.

GRIEVANCE HANDLING AND CONTRACT ADMINISTRATION

—starts Thursday, Jan. 6, 1966 in room C 202

The development of an effective shop steward system. . . . Handling grievances at various levels of the grievance procedure. . . . The scope of the grievance procedure. . . . The theory and practice of grievance arbitration. . . . Preparing and presenting grievances to an arbitrator. This course offers union members, stewards and officers an opportunity to learn facts relating to grievance handling and arbitration, with a chance to apply these principles in mock grievance situations.

REGISTRATION

Interested persons may register in Room 227, Milwaukee Vocational, Technical and Adult Schools, 1015 North 6th Street anytime before 7:20 p.m. on the night of the first class session (early registration is advisable). Registration fee for Milwaukee residents is $3.00 ($7.50 for non-residents). Milwaukee residents who registered in the fall program of union classes are not required to pay additional fees, since the fall registration fee covers winter and spring classes; however, they must still register for the class.

PURPOSES OF THE LOCAL UNION MEETING

1. To make the decisions that carry out the business of the local.

2. To inform the members about what has happened since the last meeting, what is happening at the time of the meeting, and what may be happening in the future - plus an explanation as to why these things are happening.

3. To educate the members in the principles, ideals and methods of the union and the labor movement.

4. To give the members an opportunity to speak their minds.

5. To develop a feeling of solidarity among the membership.

PROBLEMS INVOLVED IN SECURING GOOD ATTENDANCE

1. Members who feel that they must have a specific gripe before it is worth their while to attend the meeting.

2. Competition from outside interests and activities.

3. Absence of any firm pressures on members to secure their regular attendance - the feeling which some have that they do not need to attend in order to maintain their own self respect or the respect of their fellows.

4. Lack of understanding on the part of some as to the purposes of the union meeting - and of the purposes, principles, ideals and methods of the labor movement in general.

5. Inadequate publicity as to the date, time, purpose and business of the meeting - and not just the amount of publicity or the size of the notice, but the way in which the publicity is prepared.

6. The way in which some meetings are run, including:

   a. no opportunity for personal growth and development

   b. meetings which are too long, too dull or poorly organized

   c. domination of the meeting by one or two vocal members.

   d. discussion of subjects which involve only a very few of those who are present

   e. discussion which is not on the subject

   f. prolonged discussion on minor points which could be referred to a committee for investigation, report, action, etc.

   g. use of parliamentary procedure in a fashion which is beyond the understanding or experience of a majority of the members, and/or the mis-use of the procedure by some members.

IMPROVING THE WORK OF COMMITTEES

WHY HAVE COMMITTEES AT ALL?

A committee enables several persons to pool their resources, experience and interests in solving a problem or doing a job where one person couldn't do it as well. ~~alone.~~

PURPOSE

The purpose of the committee should be clearly defined. Its assignment should be clear and its specific job spelled out. Is it to

- diagnose a problem?
- suggest solutions?
- reach a decision?
- find facts?
- develop a program?
- make recommendations?
- deliver a report?
- take action?

SIZE

The size of a committee should include enough members to be able to carry out the job. It should probably be no more than 12.

SELECTION

Selection should be made in person. If faced with the situation, "Nobody will volunteer" perhaps the committee is not meeting a ~~felt~~ need. Most people will volunteer if the circumstances are right and their interests are affected.

PROBLEMS OF THE CHAIRMAN

What are the functions of a good committee chairman?

- believes in arriving at group solutions
- does all he can to bring out ideas and suggestions
- moves group forward from discussion to action
- helps group see its place in the overall union effort
- clarifies goals for the group
- makes group aware of success as it moves towards its goal

What about his relations with other members of the committee

- has confidence in other members
- wants to give members the chance to contribute
- willing to give up chairman's "prerogatives"
- feels the job is more important than his own importance

DEMOCRATIC APPROACH

Committees work best if they operate democratically with members fully participating in making and carrying out the decisions of the group.

THE AGENDA

Committee meetings should have regular agendas. The agenda should be jointly arrived at with the committee members having a full part in determining what the committee will work on and how.

COMMITTEE MEMBERS

A member on a committee has as much responsibility as the chairman for the success of the committee. Anyone who helps the group define its goals and helps move the group toward those goals is performing a leadership function.

THREE TYPES OF COMMITTEE MEMBERS

1. Self-Centered Members

   a. Blocker b. Hair splitter c. Agressor d. Playboy

   e. Recognition seeker f. Self-confessor g. dominator

   h. Special interest pleader

2. Group-Centered Members - Concentrates on Process

   a. Clarifies issues b. Harmonizes c. Compromises

   d. Expedites e. sets standards f. Observes

   g. Follows others suggestions

3. Task-Centered Member - Concentrates on Content

   a. Makes suggestions b. Gives opinions c. Gives facts

   b. Asks for information e. Elaborates f. Initiates ideas

   g. Orients h. Evaluates i. summarizes

~~THE SUCCESS OF A COMMITTE: DEPENDS ON THE DISTRIBUTION OF~~ THE LEADERSHIP FUNCTION!

NEW LEADERS

See Note

The problems of developing new leadership is very real for most local unions. The idea of co-chairman has great merit in bringing in new leadership. Co-chairman brings up fresh leaders. In addition, co-chairmen tend to make both more reliable and dependable, it is a sure way to train new leaders and provides for continuing leadership in case one leader is no longer in the situation.

Committees can serve as a place to develop leaders. New leaders can gain experience, develop understanding of the local, its members and problems. To have co-chairmen sometimes is a useful way to encourage the growth of a leader.

UNION ADMINISTRATION

University of Wisconsin
School for Workers

WHAT MAKES COMMITTEES WORK?

A. They must have a well-defined function;

B. They must have attainable goals;

C. They should have deadlines;

D. They should be required to report regularly;

E. They should consult with responsible union officers on progress;

F. They should be given recognition

By reporting at meetings;

By mention in the local paper;

By awards, prizes, by badges, jackets or armbands.

G. They should be recruited among people who are interested in the activity.

H. Recruiting should be personal;

I. Once recruited they should be elected, or if appointed, they should be given an official credential;

J. They should have authority to do what they are supposed to do;

K. They should be allowed a budget to spend for their purposes;

L. Meetings ~~should~~ could be held in connection with social events;

M. Rewards in connection with their activities should go to the committee members - for example, education committee members should go to Education Conference; fair practice to Fair Practice Conference.

N. At least once annually some meeting should focus on their activities.

Trade Union Classes – Fall 1964

TRADE UNION MEMBERS AND OFFICERS

—COSPONSORED BY—

THE SCHOOL FOR WORKERS, UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN
THE MILWAUKEE SCHOOL OF VOCATIONAL AND ADULT EDUCATION
THE MILWAUKEE AREA LABOR MOVEMENT

Classes are open to all men and women interested in studying the problems of the trade union movement.

Classes meet at the Milwaukee Vocational School, 1015 N. 6th Street.

Each class meets once a week from 7:15 p.m. to 9:15 p.m. for nine weeks starting the first week of October (see specific dates below).

CLASSES

STEWARD TRAINING AND GRIEVANCE HANDLING

Starts Tuesday, October 6, 1964 at 7:15 p.m.

This class examines the duties of the steward, why grievances arise, recognizing grievances, preparing and presenting a grievance, strengthening the grievance procedure and the steward's larger role as union officer and leader.

SPEECH AND PROCEDURES OF A UNION MEETING

Starts Thursday, October 8, 1964 at 7:15 p.m.

This class is designed to help you improve your ability to communicate ideas to others in union meetings and to help run more interesting and effective meetings. The class will devote ample time to practical work in public speaking and in conducting mock union meetings.

REGISTRATION INFORMATION

INTERESTED PERSONS MUST REGISTER AT THE MILWAUKEE VOCATIONAL SCHOOL, 1015 N. 6TH ST. ANY TIME BEFORE 7:15 P.M. ON THE NIGHT OF THE FIRST CLASS. A REGISTRATION FEE OF $3.00 IS REQUIRED.

CONTINUING EDUCATION SERVICES, THE UNIVERSITY OF CONNECTICUT

ANNOUNCES: LABOR LAWS AND LABOR LEGISLATION

This eight-session course, which begins on Friday evening, January 7, 1965, will cover important state and federal laws that affect the labor movement. This course will be as topical as today's newspaper headlines—in fact, it will be based on important labor-management court and NLRB decisions that are being reported in the daily press. How is automation being countered by the labor movement? Also the federal and state laws that affect the labor movement: Unemployment Compensation, Workmen's Compensation, and Social Security (Including Medicare).

The class will examine the latest provisions of these laws with particular attention on how they affect the individual and his family. University certificates will be awarded to those who complete the course.

Instructor: Assoc. Professor Joseph Smolen

COURSE ON "COLLECTIVE BARGAINING" TO BE GIVEN AT DENVER CENTER THIS FALL

Economics 462, "The Economics of Collective Bargaining" will be given at the Denver Center on Friday evenings from 5:35 to 7:55 starting September 24 and continuing until January 28. The course will be taught by Professor Bob Repas of Michigan State University who will be on the CLEAR staff part-time for 1965-66. This is one of the courses which Professor G. W. Zinke teaches at Boulder and which he has also taught at the Denver Center.

While pre-requisites and permission of instructor are required for college credit, adults who may not have all the required background can also take the course, but without receiving credit. The fee is $39. Persons interested in registering for the course are urged to contact the Denver Center, 1100 14th St. for a bulletin. Phone 244-6081. Registration dates are Sept. 14 for graduate students from 4:00 to 7:30 P.M. Undergraduate students M through Z, 10:00 A.M. to 1:00 P.M. and 4:00 to 7:30 P.M. on Sept. 15. Undergraduates A through L will be registered at the above hours on Sept. 16. There will be an additional fee for late registrants

Professor Bob Repas of Michigan State University Joins CLEAR Staff for 1965-66

Bob Repas, Associate Professor of Labor and Industrial Relations at Michigan State University will be on sabbatical leave from that institution and has agreed to assist CLEAR with its labor education programs on a half-time basis this year. His other time will be spent doing research on collective bargaining among public employees.

Bob has had extensive experience in labor education and will be a welcome addition to the staff. He worked with AFSC&ME Chemical Workers and the ACW. He also taught at the University of Wisconsin School for Workers and was Labor-International Affairs Rep. for the American Friends Service Committee before joining the faculty at Michigan State. In 1949-50 he had a labor fellowship at Ruskin College in England.

"Role of Labor" Course at Denver Center - Second Semester.

Social Science #312, a 3-credit course on "The Role of Labor in the 20th Century" has been given twice on the Boulder Campus and was given at the Denver Center during the spring semester. Twelve union members and eleven students with no union affiliation took the course. Unions represented included: AFT, Bricklayers, Fire Fighters, ITU, Teamsters, Machinists, Pressmen, Lathers, Brewery, Lithographers, Plumbers and Rubber Workers. Five students, who were eligible, took the course for graduate credit by doing heavier assignments.

Unions and union members interested in this course are invited to contact CLEAR or the Denver Center for details before the second semester begins. The course will again be taught by W. H. Uphoff, Professor of Economics & Director of Labor Education.

ACTIVITIES REPORT

August, 1964 - August, 1965

LABOR EDUCATION SERVICE
Industrial Relations Center
School of Business Administration and General Extension Division
University of Minnesota

INTRODUCTION

An activities report presents an opportunity for taking stock and evaluating whether proper priorities have been properly assigned and implemented. At the end of this two-year period as director of the labor eduation service, it is possible to mark more clearly some of the plus and minus components and to determine the major areas of greatest need.

Among the major minuses is the loss of Professor Joseph Smolen, who accepted a most attractive position at the University of Connecticut. In his years at Minnesota, Joe Smolen had developed as one of the leading labor educators in the country in the field collective bargaining in the public service. His years of solid accomplishment won him hundreds of friends in the Minnesota labor movement. He will be a difficult man to replace.

We also miss the superb good services of Arlene Johnson, who is presently associated with the Ford Local Credit Union. The loss of these valued members of the staff points up the need for substantially upgrading these positions in order to retain skilled and proven staff members.

A second disappointment resulted from receiving only 5% of the additional appropriation requested from the legislatue for the labor education budget. The limited resources available in labor education made it necessary to terminate negotiations for $100,000 in research funds and to cancel plans for an immediate expansion in staff. Fortunately with the help of Dean Grambsch of the School of Business Administration, Dean Thompson of General Extension Division and Provost Darland of UMD we are now able to fund one additional full-time position at UMD.

INTRODUCTION

In spite of these difficulties, the program made substantial progress in most areas, as indicated in the detailed report that follows. Perhaps the greatest advances have been in terms of the consistent improvement in the quality of the program effort and its acceptance by the Minnesota labor movement.

Last year it was possible to list a dozen key persons in the labor movement and among our colleagues at the University who were particularly instrumental in helping to establish this program. The list of close friends and active supporters this past year has grown so numerous as to preclude individual mention.

For this continuing interest and support the staff of the labor education service is deeply grateful. We are confident that the program will continue to move forward and will, in the foreseeable future, secure the resources necessary to make a truly significant contribution to the economy of the state.

Anatomy of the Collective Bargaining Agreement

Louis Yagoda, Arbitrator and Visiting Lecturer,
New York State School of Industrial and Labor Relations, Cornell University

This workshop is specifically designed for full-time union officials involved in collective bargaining. It will be devoted to an analysis of current contract patterns and clauses (relating to such basic issues as work retention, seniority, subcontracting and management rights), the practical effects of contract wording and the interpretation and application of various clauses by arbitrators.

Thursday Workshop -- begins October 14, 1965

Problem Solving and Communicating

Maggie Blough, Labor Education Specialist

This workshop, designed for full-time union officials, will provide techniques for handling the continuous flow of problems to be attacked and decisions to be communicated in administering local unions, servicing shops or representing professionals in collective bargaining. Individual skill development will be emphasized through analysis of actual union situations.

Certificates will be awarded to those who attend regularly.
